The purchase of slaves continues at the value of £5 or £6 each. When they are not bought they are obtained in the following manner: An article is laid apparently out of the way, but within reach of the negro, who steals it at once, and being taken in "flagrante delicto," becomes at once a slave. If he is a person of importance, and is claimed by his relatives or by the chiefs of the village to which he belongs, he is sometimes given up in exchange for two or three substitutes who become slaves in their village, and are put in chains and made to work under the lash and rod. Therefore, should any government seriously wish to correct or avoid any further slavery and secure free trade, in order that the Congo should again be productive to commerce, as it was ten or fifteen years ago, reforms must be made in the abuses mentioned above.—[Correspondence Boston Budget.

A Carnival of Cranks.

New York is the greatest city in the world for cranks. They thrive there. In Paris they are snubbed, except when they write for the papers, when they are glorified; in London they are suspected by the police; in Ireland they are shot; in St. Petersburg they are buried in Siberia, and in Boston they become Concord philosophers early in life, and devote themselves to study until they become too cultured for cards, when they die or come to New York. The cranks who are restrained in other cities of the world flock here by common impulse. The police do not interfere with their schemes, the public encourage them, and the newspapers treat them as legitimate sensations. Only one thing is positively known of the average New York crank, and that is that he eventually dies a violent death. The commonplace cranks are not of so much importance as men who just border upon crankiness, or who have manias of sufficient originality to entitle them to distinction.—[Exchange.

Catarrh—A New Treatment

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER I.

Mine—all mine! Mine the grand sweep of meadow-land, green and fertile, looking like a sea of gold when the wind stirred the yellow buttercups! Mine the range of purple-tinted hills that lay in the distance, clothed with trees which had been the growth of centuries! Mine the pine forest stretching down to the sea, with its rich aromatic odours, and its never ceasing music as the wind swayed the heads of the stately pines! Mine the shady woods with their open glades, their leafy cloisters, where the sunlight fell on the sward, filtered, as it were, through the boughs of the interlacing trees, where the wild-flowers grew in lavish abundance—a lovely verdant kingdom wherein the merry brown hares roamed at will and the bright-eyed squirrels leaped fearlessly from bough to bough! Mine the magnificent gardens said to be the finest, the most extensive, and the best laid out in the country, with their wealth of ferneries, and greenhouses, fountains, and statuary! Mine the fine trout stream that ran through the wide domain! Mine the numberless little brooks that meandered along peacefully and found their way to the river Floy, and were then swept on to mingle their waters with the ever restless ocean! Mine the grand old mansion called Jesmond Hall, one of the most ancient and picturesque houses in the country, a stately pile of gray stone standing on the slope of a hill! Originally it had been a castle, held by one of the early Saxon chiefs. It had changed hands many times, and had been added to, taken from, and altered until it became what it was now a confusion of architectural styles, in which the original was almost obliterated by the later additions; yet withal it was a picturesque home. The terraces and gardens had a gentle slope, and the deep swift river Floy ran at the foot of the hill; and in the distance there was a glimpse of the blue waters of the sea—for Jesmond stood on the fair coast of Hampshire. Mine the fine old ruins, with their ivy-clad walls and well-preserved keep! Mine all the wealth that had been hoarded in hidden coffers, the countless thousands that had been accumulating for long years! Mine the diamonds and rare jewels—Jesmond heirlooms! Mine the pictures—literally worth a king's ransom—the fine old silver, the treasures of gold, of rare old china, of buhl, of jaspor, and of marqueterie—all that the old Hall contained was mine—all mine!

As I, Felicia Gordon, stood on the summit of the steep grassy hill, everything on which I gazed was my own, except the vast expanse of sea which bounded my estate on the south.

I was not vain; but, looking back, I should imagine that my heart swelled at that moment with a sense of my own importance. On this large domain there were many tenants. Pretty little farms nestled in the valleys, quaint old-fashioned homesteads dotted the meadows, the straggling little village of Mead was all mine, and I owned many houses in the town that lay nearest to the Hall—Honton; so that numbers of men, women and children were dependent on me, many lives lay as it were in my hand; and on this bright May morning, when I stood on the hill top, looking over my miniature kingdom, my heart and mind were full of good resolutions.

This splendid fortune which had come so unexpectedly to me should not be spent on myself in lavish luxury, in gaieties, frivolities, or senseless extravagance. That I seriously resolved. Heaven had given it to me, and I would do good with it and use it wisely. There should be no bitter abject poverty, no sickness should go unrelieved, there should be no want of education on my fair estate of Jesmond? I would be queen and mother to my people. My heart warmed to them yearned over them, as I stood and contemplated how bounteously Dame Nature had dealt with the fruitful lands before me. No motherless children should weep on these fertile lands. My first undertaking would be an orphanage, to be built down by the sea, yet so near Jesmond that I could visit it every day. No old men or old women should live half starving and die forlorn within the limits of my domain, for I would have almshouses that should yet be comfortable homes. The sick should not lie neglected and helpless in the cottages that were mine, for I would build a large hospital near the village of Mead, where the air was clear and bracing. The children should have their schools and play grounds and education should be free to all. I would be queen and mother in a true and real sense to those whom Heaven had in a measure confided to my charge. My heart and soul were fired with these resolves.

The blue heavens shone above me; the yielding earth laughed beneath my feet; the air was full of the luscious odours of May, the scent from the pine forest, the brine from the sea, and nearer to me came heavily-laden gusts of perfume from lilac and magnolia blossom. I shall never forget the moment when, standing on the green hill top, the shining, shimmering sea in the distance, I registered my vow to live for others and not for myself alone.

The will which gave me all this wealth was indisputably clear and simple, and had in it no flaw. My uncle Sir William Jesmond had but one son, Paul, who was his natural heir and successor.

The Jesmonds of Jesmond Dene were a very old family, but at the time when my story begins their number had greatly decreased, They had died away—fathers, mothers, sisters and brother—until there was no one left of the once numerous race except Sir William, the owner and lord of Jesmond Dene, and his sister, my mother, Teresa Jesmond.

Sir William was at heart a miser. He loved money for its own sake, and the sight of it never failed to bring a smile to his hard mean face. Although my mother was his own and only sister, when she married he gave her no dowry, but very unwillingly made her a present of a few hundred pounds with an intimation that she must ask for no more. She never did: but in those days, when she deplored my uncle's meanness, she never thought that all his gold was accumulating for me.

My mother had married a clergyman, the Rev. Arthur Gordon, and I was their only child. They both died when I was a girl of thirteen, and my father's sister, Annette Gordon, took charge of me.

Sir William Jesmond was married, and a son and heir had been born unto him; but in his lifetime the home at Jesmond Dene was not a happy one. I went there once. Lady Jesmond had asked aunt Annette to bring me for the summer holidays, and I well remember the magnificent old house with its treasures, the gardens and grounds, the woods and the sea. I remember Sir William, a tall spare man with a mean face and small cunning eyes; I vividly recollect Lady Jesmond, a faded elegant woman, who seemed to me to be tired of life; but I remember best of all my handsome bright-faced cousin Paul. I was thirteen years of age then, he five years older. He was very kind to me, and I loved him with all the ardor of a childish love. He was a young prince and a veritable hero in my eyes.

'Cheer up, Felicia!" he would say to me twenty times a day. "I am going out to see the world, and, when I have seen it, I shall come home and marry you."

"But Sir William will never give us any money," I would remark, with a keen conviction that nothing could be done without it.

"I will make plenty of money, dear. My father may keep his," he would answer cheerfully.

And, of all the memories of my girlhood that of my handsome, generous laughter-loving cousin stands out the brightest and the best. How little I dreamed in those days that I should ever take his place!

My life was spent quietly enough with my aunt Annette. She had a small annuity, out of which she fed, clothed, and educated me for I had not in the wide world one shilling of my own.

It may be imagined therefore what a change it was for me—a penniless orphan—when I became sole heiress of Sir William Jesmond of Jesmond Dene, his land, shares, untold gold, all mine.

Lady Jesmond died when her son was nineteen, and after her death, Sir William became, if possible, a greater miser than ever, and almost refused himself the necessaries of life. None but the old servants bound by strong ties to the family would tolerate his meanness: even his son Paul could not endure it. He wanted to see the world, as he had alway desired, and, after many disputes and arguments, Sir William purchased for him a commission in the —th Hussars. Three months after he joined the regiment it was ordered off to India, and Paul thankfully embraced the opportunity of getting away from the paternal roof and "seeing the world" at the same time. Five years passed, and there was little communication between father and son. Sir Williams was a wretched, miserable life, and it ended as miserably as it had been spent. He was found dead in his chair, holding in his hand a letter written by Colonel Brownlow, of the —th Hussars, telling him that his son Captain Paul Jesmond had died suddenly of a malignant fever without having had time to write him one word of farewell.

The old Baronet had never seemed to care much for either his wife or child, but that letter killed him. He had given his life, his heart, his soul, to gold—he had worshipped his accumulating wealth to the exclusion of everything else in life; yet he could not live on, knowing that his handsome, careless, generous son had been snatched away in the bloom of early manhood, and he,—his father—denied the consolation of one parting word or one last look at the face he loved.

Sir William was buried in due course; and, when his will was read, it was made clear that I, Felicia Gordon, was sole heiress of all his wealth. The terms of the will were simple enough. He left everything he had in the world—land, houses, money, scrip, and shares—to his son Paul Jesmond. If his son married and had issue, the property, was to descend intact to his eldest son. If Paul Jesmond died unmarried, it was to go without reserve to his niece Felicia Gordon, the only child of Teresa Gordon, his sister. It was to descend to her children if she married; if she did not, it passed to some distant relatives to whom Sir William had always entertained a strong antipathy. That I was next of kin there was no doubt. Sir William was dead, Paul was dead; Jesmond Dene, with its rich revenues, was mine.

It was early in February when I came with aunt Annette to take possession of my new home, and it was the beginning of May when I made my resolve to live for others and not for myself.

I had been at Jesmond Dene, about three months, and had grown to love the place and the people I had just begun to put my philanthropic resolutions into shape, and my buildings were slowly rising beneath the hands of the many workmen engaged. The grand old mansion had been renovated—some of Sir William's hoarded thousands had been spent upon it —and the grounds and gardens had been rescued from the weeds and long standing neglect. I had increased my staff of servants—indeed everything was in the very perfection of order—I was unboundedly happy. I was to be happier still, although the full light of the sun was hidden from me for the present.

CHAPTER II.

A smile came over the kindly face of my aunt Aunt Annette when I told her of my resolves.

"Mother and queen!" she repeated. "I wish you health, strength, and wisdom to keep to them."

The May sun never shone on a brighter fate than mine or on a lighter heart. It was true the shadow of death lay over my new inheritance: but then I had seen my uncle only once, and that some years before. For the bright-faced handsome cousin dead in a far-off land I had the deepest pity, and one of my first acts was to erect to his memory a beautiful marble cross—and that memorial was always surmounted by fragrant flowers.

All the novelty of my position had died away when the month of May came round. I might have been Miss Gordon of Jesmond Dene all my life, everything came so naturally to me. The tenants liked and trusted me, the servants showed me absolute devotion; my buildings were all in process; my aunt and I were happy beyond words in the grand old mansion. Our neighbors had called upon us; but it was too soon after Sir William's death for us to receive or pay visits. We were happy enough without that—indeed the hours of the day were not sufficiently long for all the pleasant occupations we found to engage us. Aunt Annette was as young at heart as I was myself and, when the moon was silvering the ripples of the sea, it was no unusual thing for us to wander down to the shore and gaze in rapturous awe and delight at the majestic scene before us.

I was nearly twenty when this great change of fortune came to me, but still a girl in lightness of heart, in want of knowledge of the world and its ways—a girl, with all a girl's fresh innocent love of fun and frolic. I had had no lover; my heart was fresh and untouched.

It is a hard thing for a girl to tell her own love-story as I have to tell mine—to tell of the dream that came to me before I knew that my fair inheritance was to be the scene of a tragedy—to disclose the beautiful love dream that came to me as the revelation of a newer, brighter, higher life than any I had yet known.

In the same green county, on the shore of the same shining sea, stood an old mansion called Dunroon. It was larger than Jesmond Dene, though not quite so picturesque; still there were not many finer old places than Dunroon. The great feature of it was the river Doon, which ran through the grounds. From the hill-top I could see the tall towers and turrets of Dunroon the ancestral home of the Saxons.

When we had been some time at Jesmond Dene, Lady Saxon called upon us, and was pleased from the first moment she saw me to take great interest in me,

"The Jesmonds and the Saxons have been friends for many generations," she said: "they have loved and intermarried. It seems strange that you and I—you a young woman and I an old one—should be the sole representatives of two such ancient families."

"But you have a son," I remarked—for I had heard much of Lord Saxon.

"I do not mean that," she interrupted hastily. "Of course my son is the representative of the Saxons. What I intended to say was that it seems strange we should both have the care of house and estate. My son is away in Italy, and I do know when he will return." Here she looked at me with sudden emotion in her face. "My son is more than the whole world to me," she went on. "He is the very core of my heart, the very light of my eyes. The world is shadow to me, but he stands out clear and distinct. It is the great pain of my life that he lives away from me, that he seems to love art better than nature, Italy better than England. I cannot understand it; but it is so."

Lady Saxon was still a handsome well-preserved woman, with a penchant for rich dresses and costly furs, diamonds and priceless lace. I had heard others say that her son was "art mad." He had now been five years from home, during which time his mother had lived at Dunroon, and had managed everything for him. Indeed it was often said that but for his mother's continual mention of him Lord Saxon would have been forgotten on his own estate. My aunt and I both liked Lady Saxon, and I often listened patiently by the hour while she expatiated upon the virtues of her darling son He was the handsomest, the dearest, the best. There was no face, no voice like his. The only flaw in his otherwise perfect character was that he would loiter in Italy instead of coming home.

"Have you ever dreamed how beautiful a man's face can be?" she asked me. "Imagine one that is dark, proud, tender, and imperious, drawing the hearts of all women who look upon it—a face that seems always raised to the skies and hardly to see the lowly earth. That is my son. He is like that. I have seen women watch for the gleam of his eyes, for his smiles, for the words from his lips; but he did not see them. He sees the stars that illumine the skies, but he does not see the daisies that grow in the fields. When you come to Dunroon, I will show you his portrait, and when you see his face you will understand better."

So it happened that I thought a great deal and formed a very high opinion of Lord Saxon because his mother talked to me incessantly and almost always in praise of him.

"If he were but more like other men,' she would say, with a sigh, "if he had ambition, I should not care at what he aimed. He thinks more of a broken statue than of a seat in Parliament. An old picture has a greater charm for him than any wordly honors. Music, painting, and sculpture are the three things he loves best; and he is an English nobleman, master of a large estate, and head of a grand old race!"

I ventured to suggest that all noblemen need not have the same tastes; but she was dissatisfied because her son frittered away his time and his opportunities upon art instead of cultivating the ordinary life of an English nobleman.

"My husband," she said, "was a staunch Conservative, yet I do not believe that my son knows the difference between a Whig and a Tory. My husband never allowed one foot of timber to be cut down on his estate; my son writes always about the preservation of pictures. But he is so good that I ought to be ashamed to grumble at his one great failing."

"My son is a dreamer of dreams," she told me one morning, when she had driven over to Jesmond Dene. "He is led astray by a passionate love of beauty. He detects loveliness where others see none. The curve of an arm, the graceful arch of a neck, the beauty of a dark straight brow, delight him. He is, in fact, one of those people, half artist, half genius, who 'can hear a leaf fall.' Do you know all that that phrase means?"

"I can imagine it," I replied.

"My son has a theory that the world can be set straight by a right understanding of beauty, and by a proper cultivation of it. He is a dreamer in a world of stern reality, and some day or other I am sorely afraid his dreams will bring him bitter sorrow. If he would but marry!"

"That would perhaps cure him of dreaming," I said laughingly.

After that we paid a visit to Dunroon. While aunt Annette talked to some visitors, Lady Saxon, addressing me in a low voice, said—

"Come with me to my boudoir. My son's portrait hangs there, and I want you to see it."

I went with her. There was a strange wild beating at my heart, a strange sense of something unusual. I felt more as though I were going to see a living person than a picture.

The boudoir was an elegant room facing the west; a soft light fell on the picture of the master of Dunroon, Lord Saxon.

We stood silent before it. She did not even turn to me and say, 'That is my son." Looking at the portrait, I seemed to know by instinct why he could not help his love of beauty, and why women loved him as they looked upon him. It was a handsome, even fascinating face. The kingly poise of the head, the well chiseled features, the dark straight brows, the keen dark eyes that seemed full of pride and passion—eyes that had in them the power of controlling others—the shapely mouth, combining the firmness of a man with the tenderness of a woman—the face altogether was one that seen either in a picture or in real life must haunt you for ever. The eyes looked into mine as I stood silently marvelling at the beauty portrayed on the canvas.

'That is my son," said Lady Saxon, after we had gazed for some time upon the strangely fascinating picture.

Why did I stand there with fast beating heart and flushed face? Why did my hands tremble? Why did those dark tender eyes flash into mine as it were? I turned to her ladyship.

"What is your son's name?" I asked.

"Lionel," she answered, smiling; "but at home he was always called 'Nello.'"

Again I relapsed into silence.

"His face is full of power," said his mother proudly.

"Yes," I answered, with unconscious prophecy; "but the power is latent. It will not develop yet. He must dream out his dreams, and then——"

"Ah, then!" his mother echoed, with a sigh.

I had seen no face like the one before me. I had not believed that nature was so lavish in the bestowal of her riches upon mortal man. I went home haunted by Lord Saxon's portrait. If I looked at the western sky where the great rosy clouds were gathered, it was there; if I looked along the serried rows of dark pine trees, it was there; when the moon shone out at night, and I walked down to see it glittering on the sea, the face was there. It came to me in the starlight, in my dreams, in the rays of the sun. I saw it in the chalice of the white lilies and the hearts of the red roses.

"I am haunted," I said to myself. And even as the face seemed to be photographed on my brain, so the name rang like music in my ears, "Nello, Nello!" The birds sang it, the wind whispered it, and I laughed at my strange fancies.

The Armless Artict of Antwerp.

In Antwerp the only one of these mechanical artists who has gained more than a bare subsistence is "Felix," a man born without hands or arms, but who uses his feet instead, and with such dexterity that he paints three pictures while the every day young man whom nature has in no way distinguished barely gets through two of the same size. Needless to say, Felix finds customers while better pictures than his remain unsold at lower prices. There are too many, especially of the tourist order, who infinitely prefer a poor copy of the "Descent of the Cross," regarding which they can say: You see that picture? Painted by who do you call 'em—I forget the name—some great gun of a painter; well, sir, this copy was painted by a man named Felix—a fellow without any arms—he done it, every inch of it, sir, with his feet. I seen him to work on it myself in one of them everlasting galleries, I don't remember which one, they're all alike to me. I don't take so much stock to paintings, you know, but, by George! that fellow can do as good a picture with his feet as those big painters they make such a fuss over could do with their hands, and, as far as I can see, one's just as good as another. My daughter don't think so, but you know she's been to one of these here schools in New York. She don't take no stock in anything less its 600 or 700 years old in the way of a picture. It suits me, though. Yes, sir, painted it with his feet. I seen him do it." And so Felix, the armless artist of Antwerp, has through his affliction made enough money to purchase the house he lives in, and he could, if report be true, retire from his labors and live upon his income, while the better artist, his neighbor, in no way differing from the average brother in respect to legs and arms, starves under the shadows of the Sacred Tragedy!

Burmese Housekeeping.

The dwellings of the Burmese are built on small wood or bamboo posts; of bamboo mat walls; roofs of palm leaves, or dried grass; each house has a front verandah, closed only at the ends, if at all; the door from one to three feet from the ground, made of rough boards or of bamboos. Then the main or sleeping room is from four to six feet higher than the verandah, with its floor from seven to ten feet above the ground. The veranda is the place of cooking, eating, visiting, buying and selling. But you would look in vain for stove, oven, fireplace, or chimney. A bed of earth, or ashes, in one end of the veranda, is the centre of the kitchen; a large jar of water, two or three small earthern pots for cooking, one for rice and the other for some kind of curry, are usually sufficient; a water dipper, made of cocoanut shell, a wooden ladle for the rice pot, a bread wooden platter in which to put the rice when cooked, and around which the family squat to eat, with one or two brass or iron spoons for the curry, with perhaps two or three earthern dishes, constitute the furniture of the kitchen. Tablet, chairs, spoons, knives, forks, cups and saucers, etc., were not seen among them. To shuffle and manipulate a dozen and one articles that can't be eaten in order to get a simple meal into one's mouth is a vain display and an endless hindrance; at least, so a Burman would say. A young Burman left his jungle home to follow an English officer; when he returned he entertained the astonished household with a description of the Englishman's table—its dimensions, splendid spread, rich china, plated and glassware, cutlery, etc., and the beautiful chairs. The old mother asked, "and do they eat all these things!" "O no, of course not," replied the young man "Well, then, what's the good of it all?" was the old lady's poser.

How Slaves are Made on the Congo.

The purchase of slaves continues at the value of £5 or £6 each. When they are not bought they are obtained in the following manner: An article is laid apparently out of the way, but within reach of the negro, who steals it at once, and being taken in "flagrante delictu," becomes at once a slave. If he is a person of importance, and is claimed by his relatives or by the chiefs of the village to which he belongs, he is sometimes given up in exchange for two or three substitutes who become slaves in their village, and are put in chains and made to work under the lash and rod. Therefore, should any government seriously wish to correct or avoid any further slavery and secure free trade, in order that the Congo should again be productive to commerce, as it was ten or fifteen years ago, reforms must be made in the abuses mentioned above.—[Correspondence Boston Budget.

A Carnival of Cranks.

New York is the greatest city in the world for cranks. They thrive there. In Paris they are snubbed, except when they write for the papers, when they are glorified; in London they are suspected by the police; in Ireland they are shot; in St. Petersburg they are buried in Siberia; in Boston they become Concord philosophers, early in life, and devote themselves to study until they become too cultured for cranks when they die or come to New York. The cranks who are restrained in other cities of the world flock here by common impulse. The police do not interfere with their schemes, the public encourage them, and the newspapers treat them as legitimate sensations. Only one thing is positively known of the average New York crank, and that is that he eventually dies a violent death. The commonplace cranks are not of so much importance as men who just border upon crankiness, or who have manias of sufficient originality to entitle them to distinction.—[Exchange.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, King street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star

AERIAL FLIGHTS.

The Difference Between Birds and Balloon Flying.

In regard to the subject of balooning and the recent French experiments in steering a balloon, it may be noted that the analogies of nature are adverse to the attainment of artificial flight by means of a balloon. We do not mean by way of derision, but by way of principle. The theory of a balloon is that of levitation, that is to say, of counterposing gravity by the displacing of a given bulk of atmospheric air by a lighter gas. That the latter method involves the exposure of so large a surface to atmospheric currents as to require great force to overcome the resistance of a rapid breeze by fans, screws, or other mechanical means, is well-known. But the point to which we refer is this. In the flight of every bird or insect the weight of the animal is directly utilized in maintaining it in the air. At the will of the bird, the feathered surface that it opposes to the wind can be so inclined to the movement of the latter as to make the feature rise or fall at will, by the direct action of the wind, without any visible motion of the wings. From the deck of a vessel a gull may be watched, hovering for many minutes together, without one stroke of its wings. The bird at such times is a living kite, its power of self-balance in reducing the effect of the string of the kite in maintaining a certain inclined position relative to the wind. And although the birds of the swiftest flight have an extraordinary area of wing surface in proportion to their weight, others, of equal or even superior power of flight, have very little wing surface in proportion to their weight. Thus the problem of flight has been solved by nature in many ways; but in all of them the gravity of the living creature, far from being removed or counterposed, is an essential element of its mechanical action. The difference that we draw from this is that the opposition principle, that of levitation, is not likely to be followed with mechanical success, except on rare occasions.

Inventive Genius of Italians.

I was surprised to find how many ex-cellent inventions the Milanese possess-ed about the house were particularly ad-mirable. The upper panels of the bed-room doors were swung on hinges and screened with thumbscrews—an excellent device for ventilating the room. The bedstead rollers traveled in a light iron rail, which slid upon the carpet and thus saved it from being cut by the wheels. The bolts to the closed doors disclosed the word "libre" when open and "occupie" when shut. All this was a revelation to me. I fancied the Italians were behind the age in mechanical improvements. The client was an old countryman, simple and unsophisticated, and he had endeavored to post him on the ways and doings of cities, so that he should attend the trial without embarrassment or trepidation. By his coolness in the court tho client did honor to his lawyer.

My friend came down to spend his holidays, and we met. I asked him, laughingly, whether he had had another case since that. He looked at me curiously, and told me that something incredible had happened in regard to that affair. That same morning he met his former client and over an appetizer they had discussed the mat-ter.

"Oh, yes. Jones is getting on first rate. He's just coining money in his new business." "Ah, I'm glad to hear it. What is he engaged in?" "Counterfeiting."

A New View of his Case

The following new story will remind the reader of an old one. It has a point that will well bear illustrating.

The case being argued was old Farmer Closegrip vs. a railroad company for damages sustained in a collision.

The old man's lawyer was making a pitiful appeal to the jury.

"Gentlemen of the jury," he said, "just gaze upon the true, honest, time-beaten face of my client, and suppose he had been fatally wounded; think of the sad blow his loving wife and little, innocent children would have to receive; but, thank heaven it was not so bad as that.

"But, oh, how he must have suffered during the long days of his illness! how the heart stricken companion of his life felt when they brought him home bruised and mangled! Now, tell me shall this poor old man go down to his grave a maimed and helpless creature without some aid from the cause of his affliction?"

During this delivery, Closegrip was noticed to be very much agitated, and rising as the lawyer finished he sobbed,—

"Judge, 'scuse my breakin' in, but I must speak."

"Go on," commanded the court.

"I didn't know it wer so bad as it air till the gentleman thar sot down; an' ef ye'll let me I'll—I'll—" here he faltered.

"You'll what?" asked his honor.

"Just raise them figgers on the rail ord fer a few dollars more—make it a thousand instid o' five hundred; won't ye, judge?"

It is needless to add that the judge didn't.

Over the Fence.

Mrs. Singleton put her head over the fence and thus addressed her neighbor, who was hanging out her week's washing,—

"A family has moved in the empty house across the way, Mrs. Clothes-line."

"Yes, I know."

"Did you notice their furniture?"

"Not particularly."

"Two loads, and I wouldn't give a dollar a load for it. Carpets! I wouldn't put them down in my kitchen. And the children! I won't allow mine to associate with them, you bet. And the mother! She looks as if she had never known a days happiness. The father drinks, I expect. Too bad that such people should come into this neighborhood. I wonder who they are?"

"I know them."

"Do you? Well, I declare. Who are they?"

"The mother is my sister, and the father is superintendent of the Methodist Sunday-School."

A painful pause ensues.

Careful.

Prof. Reuger, on feeding his monkeys, in Paraguay, with eggs, observed that at first they smashed them and thus wasted much of their contents; but they soon learned to hit one end against some hard body and pick off the bits with their paws, and if they cut themselves once with any sharp tool, they would either not touch it again or handle it with the greatest caution. Lumps of sugar were given them wrapped up in paper, and sometimes a live wasp was put in to try them, so that in hastily opening the paper they got stung; but after this had once occurred they always held the packet to their ears to detect any movement.

It is only through the morning gate of the beautiful that you can penetrate into the realm of knowledge; that which we feel here as beauty, we shall one day know as truth.

Cancer.

Any disease which is acknowledged by all to be full of danger, is sure to be associated with quackery. Unprincipled men take the advantage of the popular ignorance of medical remedies to make money. In respect to no disease is this more true than in the case of cancer. And the success of imposition is made easier from the fact that the name is constantly applied to tumors of various kinds, which have nothing of a serious character, which will disappear of themselves if they are only let alone. If, however, the name of cancer has been suggested, and then either a "cancer doctor" has been called, or without any such addition some one of the boasted remedies has been employed, when the tumor gradually diminishes and eventually disappears, the case is heralded as a "cancer cure," and the delusion is greatly strengthened thereby. For instance, the common-red clover has a great reputation in some parts of the country for curing cancer, and to attempt to convince the believers in its efficacy that they are under a mistake is perfectly useless. The case of this one and of that is quoted in proof, whereas no one of them doubtless had ever the least reason for fear or the slightest sign of cancer.

The simple fact is that cancer is not at all a local disease. It affects the entire system; the change of tissues which constitutes what is recognized as the "cancer" is only the local manifestation. Hence the well known truth that removal of the ulcerated part, the tumor is constantly only a temporary relief; the disease returns to its power, and commonly is soon fatal. Hence the universal dread of "the knife," and hence the readiness to flee to those who give the comforting promise that they will "draw out the cancer by the roots;" and beyond question such men will be encouraged in this imposture by continued application for the use of their skill. If they treated only cases where true cancer exists there would be comparatively small evil done, for there is too much reason to believe that the disease is of its very nature fatal, and that its progress to a painful death is sure and steady despite the utmost human skill; but harmless tumors are constantly submitted to their care. Everything with them is invariably a "cancer," and it must be drawn out. The applications which are made destroy the tissues, for how can they draw the cancer out without it? That which was harmless becomes a source of suffering and even of danger, and if the patient recovers after the "doctor" has taken all the money available, it is paraded as a cure, whereas no cure was needed.

The domestic remedies, such as the clover above noted, are commonly harmless, and while they do no good they serve to pacify the patient. If cancer is there, it goes on its evil way unchecked; if a simple, non-malignant tumor is involved, it either disappears or remains stationary in progress, and presently clover or perhaps cancer root (Conopholis Americana) is in greater repute than ever.

A Remarkable Buffalo Hunt.

People living near Glendive, Montana, were surprised the other day by hearing a loud tramping, and through the clouds of dust kicked up they discovered a herd of buffalo making at a mad pace for the river. The animals appeared to be well-nigh run-down, but many of them were furious. As they came to the bank of the Yellowstone they plunged in pell mell, one on top of the other, and for a time it looked as though many of them would be killed, but nearly all got out uninjured. They had hardly reached the other side when a yelling, swearing crowd of white men and Indians came up on foam-covered horses. They paused here long enough to get refreshment, and then resumed the chase.

There were four or five hundred buffalo in the herd, and they were making for British America as fast as their legs would carry them. From the hunters it was learned that the hunt began down in Dakota, on the Cannon Ball River, where not less than 5,000 of the animals were found grazing. A few of the men had followed them the entire distance, but although the party that passed here numbered only thirty, its members estimated that from first to last three or four hundred men had taken part in the slaughter. Some of the men who had started out with the original party had remained behind at various points to secure the hides, and others, who only joined in for the sport, had dropped out after satisfying themselves with the chase. The rapidity with which these magnificent animals are slaughtered is shown by the fact that the hunters passing through here said they would have the hides of the remnant of the herd before reaching the boundary line.

Probably this is one of the last big buffalo hunts that will ever occur in this country. The Indian, now that he is assured of enough to eat at the agencies, is as reckless in his slaughter of the bison as the white man. He seems to consider the game as nearly extinct, and he goes in recklessly with the idea of having all the sport he can before the end is reached. The wanton destruction of this herd has caused great indignation throughout the entire section traversed, but as it seems to be the policy to exterminate the bison nothing will be done about it.

France is not prosperous. Allowing for the million and a half taken away by Germany, the population has made no progress at all since 1860. Its numbers are smaller now than they were fifteen years ago, while the load of taxation has almost doubled. Equally stationary has been the export trade. The average of recent years has indeed been lower than for the years immediately succeeding the war. Imports have, on the other hand augmented much, but not because the country has been internally prosperous. The increase is the consequence of bad harvests, and indicate a further denudation of the wealth of the people.

In The Next Great War.

If the next great war should be waged between the two nations which were parties to the last it will find the French wall protected by a granite wall of strong places, bristling with cannon, and here and there a gap, as if to tempt an unwary enemy to destruction. But no enemies so acute as the Germans would attempt to enter the country without first affecting a breach in the wall. To this end the plan of concentration and the plan of operation will have to be executed simultaneously. The campaign will open with great cavalry fights, each army trying to rid itself of these dangerous witnesses of its movements, and at the same time to ascertain those of its adversaries. The side that succeeds in beating back the enemy's horse will have scored a great advantage. The concentration of their corps d'armee will be rendered easier, the secret of their strategy more effectually guarded. This will be the object of the German commanders; and, as we may presume, also of the French. The cavalry combats will probably be followed by a great battle, offered by the army whose horsemen have been worsted, either in front of its fortifications, or in the intervals between them. This preliminary contest, though it can hardly fail to be murderous, is expected to be indecisive; for if the assailant be vanquished, he will return to the charge, while if the defenders should prove the weaker, they can withdraw behind their fortifications. Then will begin the tug of war. The iron and granite barrier that shelters the beaten foe will have to be forced at all costs. Regular siege operations will be out of the question. The delay would enable the defenders to rally and direct the bulk of their forces on the threatened point. The assailants must be able to cover their advance by an artillery fire superior at once to that of the forts and that of the army by whom they are supported. In the next great war the decisive battles will be preceded by combats of artillery greater than any the world has yet seen. After breaking the line the invaders will have to encounter the enemy a second time, if they will accept battle, or invest them in their fortified camps, if they should be so unwise as to take refuge there. Unwise, because an army in an intrenched camp is a lost army, and in this opinion Col. Heanebert, a French military writer, who discusses the subject in his "Europe Under Arms," is fully agreed with Baron von der Goltz. In the event of the defenders being a second time beaten the problem would be solved; the rest of the campaign could be conducted under normal conditions, save that the guarding of communications would require greater watchfulness and absorb many more men than previous ways were wont to do. The German staff do not seem much concerned with the idea of leaving behind them a line of strong places. They remember that in the last war the fortified camp of Langres, with its 17,000 men, did not cause them them the least embarrassment. Neither Baron von der Goltz nor Col. Hennbert is a great admirer of the exaggerated system of defense adopted by French strategists. Strong places are a shelter in time of disaster, and tend, perhaps, to give confidence to Generals, and impart a sense of security to their men; but these advantages are dearly purchased by the sacrifice of more manly qualities—dash, boldness and audacity—and by turning all their thoughts towards a defensive warfare, they exercise a pernicious influence over the head quarter staff and the Commander in Chief. The great wall of China did not keep out the Tartars, and not all the fortifications in the world can stop an army confident of its superiority, and conducted by a General who knows his business. But they must be willing to make sacrifices hardly less severe than would be inflicted by a disastrous defeat.

Remarkable Intelligence and Heroism of a Dog.

The large Newfoundland dog Heck, belonging to the St. Elmo Hotel in the oil town of Eldred, Pa., was known throughout the northern oil field for its great strength and almost human intelligence. The porter of the hotel, a kind hearted but intemperate person, was an especial favorite with the dog. The porter, a small man, slept in a little room back of the office. The dog slept in the office. On the night of Sept. 18 last, the porter was drunk when he went to bed, and soon fell into a heavy sleep. Some time in the night he was awakened by the loud barking of Heck, who was jumping frantically on the porter's bed and seizing the pillow with his teeth. The still drunken and drowsy porter tried to make the dog go away, but the animal persisted in his efforts, and it finally dawned on the befuddled mind of the porter that the house was on fire.

His room was full of smoke, and he could hear the crackling of the flames. He sprang from the bed, but he was still so drunk that he fell to the floor. The faithful dog at once seized him by the coat collar, the porter not having removed his clothing on going to bed, and dragged him out of the room and half way to the outer door of the office, when the man succeeded in getting on his feet, and, unlocking the door, staggered into the street. The fire was rapidly spreading over the building, and the hotel was filled with guests, not one of whom had been aroused. The dog no sooner saw that his helpless friend was safe than he dashed back into the house and ran barking loudly upstairs.

He first stopped at the door of his master's room, where he howled and scratched at the door until the inmates was made aware of the danger and hurried out of the house, as there was no time to lose. The dog gave the alarm at every door, and in some instances conducted guests down stairs to the outer door, each one of these, however, being a stranger in the house, which fact the dog seemed to understand in looking out for their safety. All about the house seemed to have lost their heads in the excitement, and it is said that the hotel dog alone preserved complete control of himself, and alone took active measures to save the inmates of the house. In and out of the burning building he kept continually dashing, piloting some half-dressed man or woman down stairs, only to return at once in search of others. Once a lady with a child in her arms tripped on the stairs while hurring out, and fell to the bottom. The child was thrown on the floor of the hall some distance away. The woman regained her feet, and staggered in a dazed way out of the door leaving the child in the midst of the smoke that was pouring from the office door. The brave dog saw the mishap, and jumped in through the smoke, which was now becoming almost impassable, and seizing the child by its night clothes, carried it safely out.

Notwithstanding this rescue, the mishap [illegible] death of the noble animal. The mother of the child on being restored by the fresh air first became aware that the child was not with her, and crying out wildly that "Anna was burning up in the house!" made a dash for the building, as if to rush through the flames to seek her child. Heck had already brought the little one out, but it had not yet been restored to its mother. The dog saw the frantic rush of the mother toward the burning building and heard her exclamation that some one was burning up in the house, and, although the building was now a mass of smoke and flames inside and out, the dog sprang forward and, as a dozen hands seized the woman and held her back from the insane attempt to enter the house, disappeared with a bound over the burning threshold. The faithful animal never appeared again. His remains were found in the ruins. There is no doubt in any one's mind that but for the intelligence and activity of Heck the fire in the hotel would not have been discovered in time for a single inmate to have escaped from the building with his life; and that the noble animal understood from the half-crazed movements of the child's mother that there was still another one in danger, and to rescue whom he gave his own life, is accepted as certain. The remains of Heck were given a fitting burial, and his loss is regretted as that of a useful citizen might be.

HOLLAND'S FIGHT WITH THE SEA.

A Corps of Engineers Always at Work.

After a delicious breakfast of coffee and thick cream, with rusks, scones, and different kinds of cheese, always indispensable in Dutch breakfasts, we took to the railroad again and crossed Zealand, which chiefly consists of four islands, Noordt, Beveland, Zuid Beveland, Schouwen, and Walcheren, and is less visited by the rest of the Netherlands than any other part of the country. The land is all cut up into vast polders, as the huge meadows are called, which are recovered from the sea and protected by embankments. Here, if human care was withdrawn for six months, the whole country would be under the sea again. A corps of engineers, called "Waterstaat," are continually employed to watch the waters and keep in repairs the dikes, which are formed of clay at the bottom, as that is more waterproof than anything else, and thatched with willows, which are here grown extensively for the purpose. If the sea passes a dike ruin is imminent, an alarm bell rings and the whole population rush to the rescue. The moment one dike is even menaced the people begin to build another inside it, and then rely upon the double defense while they fortify the old one. But all their care has not preserved the Islands of Zealand. Three centuries ago Schouwen was entirely submerged and every living creature drowned. Soon after Noordt Beveland was submerged and remained for several years entirely under water, only the points of the churchspires being visible. Zuid Beveland has been submerged in the fourteenth century. Walcheren was submerged as late as 1808, and Tholen even in 1825. It has been aptly asserted that the sea to the inhabitants of Holland is what Vesuvius is to Torre del Greco. De Amicis says that the Dutch have three enemies—the sea, the lakes, and the rivers; they repel the sea, they dry the lakes, and they imprison the rivers, but with the sea it is a combat that never ceases.

A Weed Which Eats Fish.

Commander Alfred Carpenter, writing from Suakim, Red Sea, contributes this instance of a carnivorous plant preying upon vertebrats, observed by him in 1881, when he was surveying at the Paracel islands, in the South China sea: "The tide was low on the reef on which I was strolling and admiring the lovely forms, of coral existence. As I neared a pool cut off by the tide from the sea I noticed among other submarine verdure a very ordinary looking flesh-colored weed about one foot high and of similar girth. My appearance alarmed numbers of tiny fish, which darted to the cover of overhanging ledges, but I noticed about half a dozen apparently seeking cover in the weed. Bending down closer I saw that they were lying helpless about the fronds, with very little life left in them. Putting my hand down to pick up one of the half dead fish I found my fingers sucked by the weed, the fronds of which closed tightly on them. The fish were not caught by the head especially, but held anywhere round the body. The death seemed to be slow and lingering, and where the fish had been held its skin was macerated. These captives may have been caught some time, and were in different stages of exaustion. I regret being unable to name the plant or the young fish. They were from an inch to an inch and a half long. The plant had a dirty and rather slimy look about it."

Almost Eternal Springs.

Standing in the city of Lima, Peru, one looks to the west, on the broad expanse of the ocean, and to the east, on the ever snow capped peaks of the Andes. The mountains and the ocean play the game of battledor, continually throwing back gentle breezes night and morning. It has rained there but twice or three times within the memory of man, and the temperature varies but little from 60° to 90° Fahrenheit throughout the year. The climate is almost an eternal spring, with sunshine and deep blue unclouded skies. To add to its salubrity and freshness the river Rimac, in cascades, descends from the snow of the mountains through the heart of the city. With such a climate and such surroundings, no wonder the Limanan makes the further proud boast that "their senioritas are the fairest of all the daughters of Eve."—[Correspondence Chicago Current.

A Crab That Climbs a Tree.

In some of the islands of the Malay Archipelago and neighboring counties, the cocoanut is obtained in a curious manner. An enormous crab is found there that lives on the fruit, climbing the trees and tearing them off, either hurling them down or breaking them by tearing of the husk, and then beating them against the rocks with its huge claws. The husk that the crabs take from the fruit they carry to their holes at the foot of the trees and make a bed of it, and knowing this, the Malays visit and rob the crabs once or twice a year, using the husk to weave into mats.—[Golden Days.]

MARKDALE OCT. 16, 1884.

ANOTHER PIONEER GONE.—Mr. Thos. Richardson of Euphrasia was one of the early pioneers of this district; was a highly respected and well-to-do farmer. After a short illness he passed away early Sunday morning at the age of 63 years. The funeral was largely attended.

THE SCOTT ACT.

There has been nothing more wonderful in the social history of Canada than the growth of public sentiment in favor of prohibition. For many years teetotalism, like vegetarianism, was regarded as a harmless craze, and its devotees put down as an erratic sort of people. By and-by it attained the dignity of a doctrine, but even then it appealed almost exclusively to the rugged morality of the rural districts. It was not until the churches had indentified themselves with the movement that it rose to the hight of a crusade and began to make conquests of towns. It now promises to sweep from victory to victory, and to force, at no distant day a general prohibitory law.

BUSINESS.

There are two particular reasons why farm produce is not being marketed in greater quantities: First, the weather is so fine that farmers cannot think of giving up their fall plowing in order to thresh and market their grain, and in the second place the markets being low, they imagine it at least safe to hold a while longer. From returns of the amount of wheat and corn all over the world it is impossible to come to any conclusion other than that wheat must rule very low for twelve months to come, and while every farmer knows there is a material loss in holding grain, from shrinkage and rattage, besides the risk from fire, it is not surprising to see a number of the most shrewd and well-to-do farmers marketing their produce. When the question is put by the more speculative class, the answer is that in their experience they have found that taking one year with another it is money in their pocket to market their grain when the season comes for it, or as soon as can be threshed after harvest. If this plan were acted upon generally at the present time it would set the wheels of commerce rolling in a very desirable manner, and would doubtless be a decided gain to the whole community, farmer as well as mechanic and businessman.

Slander.

To the Editor of the STANDARD.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

Thou serpent-like monster of iniquity—the female spawn of the concentrated essence of all villainies; the offspring of that creation which has its germ in the dregs of damnation. Thou hast no humanity in thy composition; and, when thou diest, the demon which thou dost serve, will drag thy vile carcass back to his region of Inferno, and out of thy ashes, like the Phœnix of old, another female demon will arise, and, like thyself, take up her abode in the otherwise reputable town of Markdale. Thou hast truly performed the mission upon which thou wast sent to Markdale by thy satanic father—to destroy virtue and kill the innocent; but, think:—the joy thou dost experience in the sorrow thou hast created in the breast of the pure and holy, will be doubled one hundred fold in the agony thou shalt endure, before thy fatherly cremator shall have reduced thy vile imitation of humanity to the base ashes from whence it sprang, in the great crucible of his fiendish torments. —Beware of the Avenging Angel.

Yours truly,

ONE WHO HAS BEEN SLANDERED.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—I have delayed writing until I would be in a position to know what the harvest here would prove. Hay, which was a plentiful crop, was saved in good condition. Spring wheat and oats will, I think, be greatly spoiled by rain; in fact I hear that some parties have given up all hopes of saving their oats, which have been cut down and laying in swaths for two weeks. A great deal of wheat is badly grown in the stooks. The weather is sometimes very perverse here as well as in Ontario. The summer was almost too dry, and now when the rain is least wanted, it must come, and when it does rain here, it just lets it down for all it's worth. It has held to it now for a fortnight, and at present date of writing (Sept. 4) has anything but the appearance of having tired of it. There is every appearance of an early winter. You can see there has been snow on the mountains and it feels quite chilley on the low lands—quite the reverse of what it was at this time last year.—A person starting on a new farm here must needs have a good deal of means. Oxen are now worth from $200 to $300, cows $50 to $70, ploughs $30, and everything in proportion, and to clean a fir bush farm it is worth from $60 to $100 per acre. In a wet season it is almost an impossibility to run off the timber, particularly old fallen trees. The worst sample in Ontario is nothing compared with it. Cedar grows upon all lands. You ask, as I used to do, how do they manage to chop down these large firs. Just cut a three or four inch notch into the tree as deep as you can, and as high as you can conveniently reach, insert a slab or piece of plank, get up on this, cut another higher up as before, and a third if necessary, so as to get above the swell of the roots. The plank you stand on while chopping is provided with a plate of iron or steel with teeth, screwed on the upper side of the end, and when placed in the notch prevents the plank from slipping out. You never see two men at a cross-cut saw. It is never thought of. I have not seen any Canada thistles here. The fern I believe is as bad. The roots run in the ground much the same as the thistle, and are nearly an inch thick, very tough. The pigs are fond of them. This fern is not what we call fern in Ontario. This grows from six to eight feet high. They are the pest of the country. There are other timber lands called older bottom, which is much easier cleared and yields better crops afterwards. Root crops will be good. Salmon, I believe, has been a poor crop this year. You have to pay $1 for a good one in the spring of the year, and now you get a 30 lb. larger for 25 cents. The spring opens up earlier here, but you have a more rapid growth, and consequently as early if not earlier harvest. Older settlers now begin to say they have seen it rain for six weeks steady one harvest, and nothing was saved. I am giving you both sides as it comes. The summer was pleasant; but this is abominable. Sept. 20, rain has cleared off; more rain yet in view.

Yours truly,

J. M. WEBSTER.

Weather fine.

Businesss improving.

The town in holiday attire.

Grain coming into market rapidly.

Prices good, as compared with other marts.

A gentleman entered my shop the other morning, with the query "Are you Valentine Muggins?" I instinctively answered, "No!" and inquired why he asked the question, when he asked me had I not read the Advance. On turning to my desk I took the last issue of the paper, and on the last page I found a correspondence detailing Mr. Munshaw's cruelty to T. H. Firth, tenant to the former. As I know something of the case, it may be summed up thus: Firth leased a brick house, garden, and four acres of land from Mr. Munshaw two years ago. The garden and young orchard were in excellent keeping at that time; but Mr. Firth in two years has allowed the premises to become over-run with grass and weeds until to-day the premises bear no resemblance to that of two years ago. I have been informed that the destruction to the interior of the building is even greater injury than the neglect to the grounds. So Mr. Munshaw gave him notice to quit by raising the rent. Firth attempted to sneak away to another house, leaving a balance of rent unpaid. The man, Firth, is in constant employment — Mr. Munshaw employed him a long time during the past year in painting and papering—and had he been a saving man could certainly have paid his rent, as every one must admit he had a cheap bargain of the premises; and why the Advance should have published such a tirade of abuse against Mr. Munshaw, whose probity of character is a household word from Orangeville to Owen Sound, is to us all a mystery. Perhaps the Advance can explain. His theory that Mr. M. was jealous of the teetotal influence of Firth is moonshine. If Firth possesses influence, the Advance may justly lay claim to the credit of being the first discoverer thereof.

Yours,

CIVIS.

Baird's "Joshua Whitcomb."

R. H. BAIRD and his company rendered this popular play in Rae's Hall Saturday evening to a good house. The play is choked full of fun and good humar and was heartily enjoyed by all. Now and then there appears a tinge of the sorrowful side of life, but this only tends to enhance the merriment which follows. As "Uncle Josh" Mr. Baird keeps the audience in roars of laughter; as the pretty and vivacious Boston belle Miss Vaughn is inimitable; by her pathetic voice and manner Miss Edith Bartlett's "Tot" won the sympathy of her hearers; and Mr. P. Redmond in his budget of comic specialties is alone worth the price of admission. The company is one of the best on the road and well equipped.

ASSAULTED.—A few days ago, as Mr. Frank Millsap was going up the track towards home, when about a mile and a half from the village, he was assaulted by two tramps. After abusing him, and then relieving him of his money and tobacco, they departed, leaving him in an insensible state on the track. How long he lay there he is not sure. He is now under Dr. Griffin's care. Pity the rascals could not have been caught.—Dundalk Herald.

HORSE THIEVES.—On Sunday night or Monday morning last some thieves entered Dr. Rolstin's stable and stole his mare, buggy and harness. The mare is a light bay four years old, the buggy is a covered one with Brewster springs, and the harness is silver mounted and almost new. The Dr. only arrived home about eleven o'clock on Sunday night, and the mare and rig must have been taken between that time and daylight. Telegrams have been sent in all directions, but up to the present time no tidings have been received.—Shelburne Free Press.

J. P. Marshall, Dentist, visits Markdale regularly on first and third Wednesday of each month. He gets all he can do in the time, and expects he will have to come oftener or stay two days each trip. His office is in the Markdale House.

Welcome.—Owing to financial difficulties the Orangeville Gazette has been suspended for over two months. Last week, however, it came to hand, and we are glad to say, improved in appearance. We wish it abundant prosperity in future.

Mr. Enoch Boyce, lot 14, con. 6, St. Vincent, has an apple tree of the winter variety in full bloom and still loaded with this season's apples. He has also in his orchard a pear tree now bearing the second crop of pears for this season, the second crop being now half grown.

We regret not being able to attend Osprey Fall Show. Owing to pressure of office work we could not put in an appearance and consequently cannot give particulars of the fair; it was however a beautiful day and no doubt the fair was a success. The list of prizes awarded may be found on the supplement enclosed in this issue.

J. R. Trimble would respectfully invite every person in need of winter clothing to inspect his stock. Having recently purchased a large line of boys' and mens' suits and overcoats at a Bankrupt sale, he can offer them at 25 per cent less than the same goods can be purchased for in any other house in Markdale.

The editor of the Durham Chronicle thinks prize lists of fall shows are rather monotonous affairs, and does not intend publishing such in future. They do seem monotonous when a week out of date. We believe withal, they are more interesting to a greater number than the same amount of any other matter.

At a meeting of the trustees of the Methodist church, Markdale, held last Thursday, it was decided to test the willingness of the congregation to building a new church, by passing round a subscription list. Should the committee, appointed for the purpose meet with success, (as we have no doubt they will) then a public meeting of the congregation will be called to take further action.

A Change.—There is a change in the proprietorship of the Grey Review. Mr. J. Townsend published last week his valedictory, and his brother, B. H., takes control. Mr. J. Townsend has proved himself an able and energetic publisher, and the Review is hard to beat as a local and family journal. We are personally acquainted with B. H., the new editor, and have confidence in his ability to conduct the Review so that it will not lose its popularity.

Keep Cool.—Gentle reader let me give you a little solid advice. Don't get mad and hop around vowing vengeance on the editor and threatening to annihilate the whole business by stopping your paper, just because you see something in the paper about yourself that you do not like. Just imagine the editor to be a bold bad man who don't give a straw for Sam Hill, M. P., M. D., or a whole army of pugilists, and remember, that in all probability, the same reason that led you to stop your paper, will be the cause of a dozen new subscribers.

Welcome Back Again.—It is with pleasure we hail the return of our genial young friend, Mr. Frank Wismer, and we are sure the young people of the village will be equally pleased. He leaves in a few days on a canvassing tour for Cosgrove & Co's jewelery and silverware establishment, Toronto. Our gymnasium club will miss his musical services, which added much to the attraction of their entertainments. The best our boys can do is to make an effort to raise a brass band and secure Mr. Wismer's services as teacher during the coming winter. Let a move be made at once.—Com.

The Tea-meeting held at the Ebenezer appointment of the Euphrasia Methodist Mission, on the evening of the 13th inst, was a decided success, the evening being fine and roads good; the church was crowded. The provisions were in abundance just such as the ladies of that neighborhood are noted for getting up. After the eating was dispensed with, the meeting was called to order by a few remarks from the Rev. Thos. Grandy, Pastor of the church. Mr. Thomas Kells was elected to preside over the meeting which he did in his usual efficient way. Several local gentlemen gave neat and intelligent addresses. The speech of the Rev. Wesley Casson was one of the best it has been our privilege to hear in a long time. The Rev. Alfred Andrews gave a brief description of the "Tabernacle of Moses," illustrating it with chart and map, and finished his address by refering to the Scott Act and very clearly showed the necessity for such an act. The singing by the local choir was good. Proceeds $28.30.

AGRICULTURAL:

Management of Sheep in October.

The first part of the season, over nearly the whole country, was so wet as to produce a large growth of grasses, and pastures were everywhere flush. Still, in some places, it was observed that sheep did not lay on flesh as fast as when the growth of grass was more moderate, it was too watery and contained less substance. But September has been dry over a large extent of country, and pastures have become short. This will, in many sections keep the condition of sheep lower than will be desirable for fall sales, and thinner than they should be for the most profitable winter feeding.

We do not believe that any feeder can afford to let his sheep get thin because his pasture is short—that is the policy of the man who remarked that he "always made his hay hold out whether his cattle did or not!" When an animal is not thriving all profit at once ceases, and loss begins.

The question then arises, what shall the sheep-feeder do to keep up a steady growth on young sheep, steady gain on fattening sheep, and a full, healthy condition in breeding sheep, when drought cuts off the supply of grass? If the Ensilage system has been fully entered upon, then succulent clover and other grasses preserved in silo may be given to excellent effect; but this system is only yet on trial by the "one in a thousand," and won't apply to the general sheep-feeder. For breeding sheep one-half pound of wheat bran, fed in troughs in pasture, will probably make up the deficiency. A little extra food goes a long way in keeping up condition. For 8 months lambs and young growing sheep a half pound of bran with one to two gills of corn, or one-half pound of oil meal, will keep them thriving. For fattening sheep to be sold in late fall or early winter, one pound of corn and a half pound of oil meal; this, with half pasture, will push them forward favorably.

These specific rations are not intended to be considered as adapted to all cases. The feeder's eye must take in the situation of each flock, and adapt the ration to each particular case. But we have seen the quantities named produce excellent results with the different classes of sheep mentioned.

There is another method which we have adopted on several occasions when pasture was cut off by drought. We took early cut and nicely cured clover and timothy hay, cut into very fine chaff in a power cutter, then moistened this chaff so that ground feed would adhere to it, and mixed the bran. oil meal, &c., with it. This mixture was placed in the troughs, and the sheep ate it all down. The cut hay was about twice the bulk of the ground feed. We found that the whole was more completely digested when cut hay was added.

This plan could only be followed by those who use a cutter, and then it does not add very materially to the labour. When oats are cheap, there is no better food for sheep on pasture.

The rule of profit must always be to full feed growing and fattening sheep. This brings them to maturity and market at the earliest period and commands the best profit. If sheep are allowed to stand still, without gain or growth, then the food eaten is utterly wasted. We have always found a little grain in the fall to pay even with fair pasture, because the fattening sheep can digest a little concentrated food besides all the grass they will eat; and this concentrated nutriment will all go to gain or profit. Every feeder should look carefully to his sheep and see that they have enough regardless of drought.—[Canadian Breeder.

Look after the Weeds.

One of the most thoughtless and unwise things a farmer can do, and yet a practice so common that a farmer's garden has become a synonym for a weed nursery, is to let weeds take possession of every plac made vacant by the removal of any crop. This practice not only exhausts the fertility of the soil, but fills it so full of noxious seeds as to greatly multiply the labour of keeping a clean garden the following season. It is a very sensible practice to so arrange the various plants that those maturing together, at different times, shall be grouped, so that as they mature and are removed, the vacant ground shall all come in one plot, gradually enlarging, as others mature and are removed. When so placed, a boy. horse and cultivator can go over the ground in a very short time, and, by repeating the operation at intervals of one or two weeks, the ground can be kept entirely clean. See to it now that all weeds grown in and about the garden are carefully cut or pulled, and all, root or branch, placed in a pile and burned. The seeds are so fully matured that it is not safe to place them even in a compost heap, and it is better to sacrifice what little manurial value they contain than to scatter the seeds. By cutting or pulling them when damp, but few seeds will shell out, and by putting an armful of dry straw or brush at the bottom of the pile and leaving them till mid-day, they can be easily burned. Every day you now neglect this little "chore," the more weeds you will have to contend with next summer. Go for them at once!

General Rules for Breeding Light Horses.

Mr. H. Pratt, of Gawsworth, Co. Cork, one of the most successful breeders of light horses in Ireland, lays down the following rules for the breeding of hunters and saddle horses:

"1. Determine exactly what it is you really require to produce, and having done so never lose sight of it.

"2. Procure a young mother that has arrived at maturity and is healthy, roomy, well-shaped, round, large-sized, with good temper and good action, and remember the better bred the mare is that possesses those qualities the more valuable she will be,

"3. The dam, as a general rule, has more direct influence on her offspring as regards health and size than the sire has.

"4. The offspring bred from greatly dissimilar parents in either size or character should never be used for breeding purposes; their offspring will certainly prove to be mongrels of nondescript character. That the parents should be as similar as possible is a rule the neglect of which has led to more disappointment than almost any other rule I know of.

"5. A pure thoroughbred sire that has got good ones should be selected, and I do not believe a really good weight-carrying hunter will ever be bred from anything but a thoroughbred horse.

"6. The sire has more direct influence on the bones, heart, tendons, and nerves of the foal than the mare, consequently nothing but blood horses will produce stout and fast hunters.

"7. Breeding too early is quite incompatible with hardiness of constitution and lasting qualities. Hence I believe the mare should be at least four years old before she is put to the horse."

How to Save Corn Fodder.

Prof. Sanborn, of Missouri, says the complaint that stock will not eat corn fodder well, or over one-fourth to one-third of it, arises from our method, or lack of method, of securing it. Most of our corn is allowed to stand as it grew, and to have its nutrition washed out of it, and then it is fed where it grew to cattle roving through the field. The bleached stuff is little liked and little eaten. A few cut it and put it into large shocks, but not until after the corn is dead ripe. It should be cut while the stalks are yet quite green, the corn being in the latter stages of the dough state, or before the corn is too hard to crush easily in the fingers, and before it is dry throughout. It should be put into shocks made from four hills in place of the old 16 hills square, and bound round the top by rye straw, twine, or a green corn stalk. It is well to bend the tassel down, binding the tops under, thus turning the rain. In the course of two to four weeks, depending upon the weather, the small shocks may easily be husked out, and the corn cribbed. The band will not have to be removed or the shock taken down in husking. After husking, the hills of corn, around which the shock is made, as fast as the shock is wanted, may be cut, and the fodder of the shock may be quickly and easily, by one man, passed to the waggon for stacking, the band around the shock always remaining on. Thus treated, it will be tender, more palatable, and more nutritious, and when fed with clover, cotton seed meal, or middlings, will be nearly all eaten. It will also be handled from the start at less expense per acre than by the system of 16 hills square shocks.

A Litte Hero.

A sad story of a French drummer boy is told at Heidelberg, in connection with the last siege of that city. The Austrians were in possession of the place, and the only means of attacking them was by crossing the old bridge over the river Neckar. But the defenders were well prepared for the attack; they placed their cannon in such a manner that it covered the bridge and its approaches. The French planted their cannon on the opposite side of the river, and kept up a terrible fire, but were utterly unable to dislodge the Austrians from their end of the bridge. The attackers were determined to take the city, but had no other means of doing so than by crossing the bridge, and that was swept by the guns their opponents. They made repeated charges from their side, but each time they advanced they were mowed down by the Austrian artillery, or repulsed at the point of the bayonet. The French band advanced as far as the centre of the bridge, exciting the soldiery with their martial strains, but were compelled to retreat with the retreating men. Again and again the musicians advanced and retreated, with their comrades, until at last a little drummer boy, disdaining flight, mounted on the parapet of the bridge, and, although his fellow-bandsmen fled with the soldiers, stood his ground manfully, beating a wild air to recall the men to the charge. On rushed the Austrians with fixed bayonets, whilst the little hero, still beating his drum defiantly, was run through the body by some brutal foe. As he fell over the bridge into the rapid rushing river below, the poor boy cried out, "Oh, my mother! my mother!" The last words of the little conscript were heard, both by friend and foe, and are yet remembered in Heidelberg. On wild nights, as the peasant crosses the bridge, in fancy he still sees the form of the little drummer boy beating the fierce alarm, and still, amid the rush of the waters, imagines that he hears his dying words, "O, my mother! my mother!"—[Exchange.

A Ghost Story from the Pacific.

A correspondent in Canton sends the Pall Mall Gazette the following story from the Marshall Islands: The end of last year an American ship the "Ranier" was wrecked on these Islands, and about 20 men found refuge on them. But their number being too large for their supply of provisions it was agreed that the party should separate. The captain caused a small twenty-ton schooner to be built of the remains of the wreck, and taking ten of the crew and a share of the provisions sailed away for another island of the group about 200 miles off. The rest of the crew was left in charge of the first mate—a son-in-law of the captain. The second mate was sent off to make his way to Saigon and appeal for aid. This he did, finally reaching Hong Kong, when the U.S. corvette "Essex" was despatched to the rescue, carrying the second mate as a guide. Meanwhile the king of the island on which the shipwrecked men were, who was kind and friendly to them, was full of forebodings as to the fate of the captain's party and the second mate; said they would never see them again, and so on. But one day he came with different tidings. It seems he was in the habit of holding spiritual communion with his dead wife, by name Olivia. In one of the seances he had, I suppose, asked her if she could give him any tidings, any hopes, for his shipwrecked friends. She said that on a Sunday a sail would be seen, and they would be rescued. The king brought this news with great joy to the refugees, and with some curiosity they awaited the result. This must have been some four months after they were wrecked. Sure enough on the following Sunday a sail was seen, but in spite of their efforts to attrack attention the ship passed on her course. But the Sunday after that the rescuing ship, the "Essex" appeared in sight, and eventually took them all off. This story was related by an officer of the "Essex" to a friend of mine, who at once told it to me. These Islands are in the North Pacific Ocean, to the S. W. of the Sandwitch Isles, and there is very little communication with them.

AMERICAN FABLES.

A number of Sharks once Gathered in Convention to Discuss the Question: "Shall a Sailor be Eaten Head or Feet First?" As they were about Equally Divided in the Discussion a Wrangle soon Resulted, and from angry Words they began to Battle with each other, and many hard Knocks were given and Received. A Whale finally made his Appearance and Commanded the Row to cease, and when order had been Restored, he said:

"Why Fight over how a Sailor should be Eaten when none of you have Sighted a Ship for the last six months?"

THE JUG AND THE JAR.

A Jug and a Jar which found themselves on a shelf together began to plume themselves on their Merits.

"I cost thirty-eight cents," observed the Jug.

"And my owner walked ten miles to secure me," replied the Jar.

"I hold two gallons of water."

"And I am nearly always filled with milk."

"My master takes me to the hay-field and gives me the shadiest spot."

"And the women carry me in their arms up and down the cellar stairs."

They were still disputing when the Peasant's wife entered the room and said to herself:

"My husband having brought home a new tin pail, I can now throw the old Jug and Jar out of the back door."

Our merits are best known to ourselves; our faults to the world.

A QUEER QUARTETTE.

An Elephant was standing in all his majesty under the shade of a Banyan tree when a Hare, a Frog and a Sloth Approached him in Company, and the Hare Announced that they Desired to journey across the country with him in search of wisdom.

"Haw! haw! haw!" laughed the old Colossal as he flapped his ears around, "that's too good. The Idea of such Insignificant Nonentities as you are thinking you can Teach me Wisdom. Well, well, but that's worth Bottling up."

The Hare stuck to her point so Persistently, however, that the elephant finally decided to humor the trio, and a start was made. They had not proceeded above a quarter of a mile when the Sloth asked for a slower pace. The Elephant sneered at this, but in the next ten minutes discovered that had he stuck to his swinging pace he would have run into a Band of Hunters crossing the Trail.

When the journey had lasted an hour the Hare suddenly called for a Halt, declaring that the notes of the Birds in the Branches above Betokened Strangers in the Forest.

"And what of it?" sneered the Elephant, but next moment the Hare pointed out several Natives stealing away from a Pitfall they had Constructed in the Path. A hundred feet further and the Colossus would have been Trapped.

The Quartette had scarcely circled the Dangerous place and struck the path again before the Frog began to Croak.

"And what's up now?" asked the Elephant.

"There is going to be a terrible storm. I, being a Swimmer, will remain here. The Sloth, being a climber, is safe in a tree. The Hare, being a Swift Runner, can distance the Flood. As for you, Sir Colossus, with all your size and strength, you must at once hurry to the Hills to save your Life."

"Poor, Silly Fools!" exclaimed the Elephant, as he looked down upon them in Contempt, "When such as you teach me wisdom I shall expect to see Hen's Feathers growing on the backs of Wolves."

Nevertheless the storm broke and raged fiercely for hours. Next day, when the Frog, the Sloth and the Hare met again, it was Beside the Dead Body of the Elephant, and the Hare answered:

How to Judge a Horse.

An old horseman says if you want to buy a horse don't believe your own brother. Take no man's word for it. Your eye is your market. Don't buy a horse in harness. Unhitch him and take everything off but his halter, and lead him around. If he has a corn, or is stiff, or has any other failing, you can see it. Let him go by himself a way, and if he staves right into anything you know he is blind. No matter how clear and bright his eyes are, he can't see any more than a bat. Back him, too. Some horses show their weakness at tricks in that way when they don't in any other. But, be as smart as you can, you'll be caught sometimes. Even an expert gets stuck. A horse may look ever so nice, and go a great pace, and yet have fits. There isn't a man could tell it till something happens. Or he may have a weak back. Give him the whip and off he goes for a mile or two, then all of a sudden he stops in the road. After a rest he starts again, but he soon stops for good, and nothing but a derrick could move him. The weak points of a horse can be better discovered while standing than while moving. If he is sound he will stand firmly and squarely on his limbs without moving any of them, the feet flatly upon the ground with legs plump and naturally poised; or if the foot is lifted from the ground and the weight taken from it, disease may be suspected, or at least tenderness, which is a precursor of disease. If the horse stands with his feet spread apart, or straddles with his hind legs, there is a weakness in the loins and the kidneys are disordered. Heavy pulling bends the knees. Bluish, milky cast eyes in horses indicate moon blindness or something else. A bad-tempered horse keeps his ears thrown back. A kicking horse is apt to have scarred legs. A stumbling horse has blemished knees. When the skin is rough and harsh, and does not move easily to the touch, the horse is a heavy eater and digestion is bad. Never buy a horse whose breathing organs are at all impaired. Place your ear at the side of the heart, and if a wheezing sound is heard it is an indication of trouble.

Photographing a Bully.

The frontier town of Cheyenne, Texas, had been pestered for some time by one of those swaggering bullies who delight in terrifying women and children, and inoffensive citizens. The desperado boasted that he could "clean out" the whole town single handed. He was accustomed to enter the stores, demand whatever caught his fancy, and threatening to shoot the proprietor if the article was not forthcoming at once, emphasizing his threat by flourishing a horse pistol. One day, this "flower of the plains," as he facetiously called himself, sauntered into a photographer's studio. The artist, a young man from New York, had been in Cheyenne but a short time.

"Well, tenderfoot," said the bully, as he dropped carelessly into a chair, "what do you charge for pictures?"

"I beg your pardon," answered the artist, replied his visitor, pulling out his pistol. "I asked you how much you charged for pictures?"

"I beg your pardon," answered the artist, quietly, "but I did not understand your first remark."

"No? I don't repeat remarks, young feller," replied the visitor, pulling out his pistol. "I asked you how much you charge for pictures?"

"Eight dollars a dozen, large size."

"As large as my size?" sneered the bully.

"I have taken them your size," answered the young man, coolly.

"Well, look here, you! I don't intend to pay any such price. My size is too big for this establishment. You are going to give me a sitting for nothing. Do you understand that, stranger?"

"I think I do."

"Then the quicker you mix the chemicals for the scenery of this view, the better. Step lively!"

The young artist looked black for a minute, and then, as if he thought the matter a good joke, burst into a laugh.

"You are sure you want to sit for a large size picture?" he asked, with a queer look on his face.

"Yes. And you want to be quick about it, too. No fooling. That won't go down with this son of the plains. Where are you going."

"I must get the materials for the picture from my other room."

"Oh, all right!" growled the bully. "Thought you were going to cut. But you don't fool this child!"

The artist went into his other room and came back with the prepared plate which he put into its place in the camera. Unobserved he also slipped something else into the box of the instrument over which the cloth was laid.

"Now then, sir," said he, still laughing. "How will you have the picture, sitting or standing?"

"Well, I'll have it the way I am," answered the desperado, throwing his pistol on a table and folding his arms across his breast in a defiant manner.

"Very well, sir," said the artist, quietly putting his head under the cloth. "Now, then, just fasten your eyes on that projection in the corner over there. Don't move. If you move an inch I'll defend my rights with this!"

And quick as lightning, the photographer threw off the cloth, and pulled out a revolver from the camera, where he had hidden it.

It was a scene for an artist. The bully looked along the barrel saw it was as steady as if it rested on a stone wall, and the sweat gathered in big drops on his forehead. Like most bullies he was a coward. The artist had him completely at his mercy. He coolly took out his watch with his left hand.

"For large-pictures of this kind, I generally take three minutes. But to insure a good sitting in your case, I will make it a little longer, Steady, my dear sir! If this revolver should go off, in haste, it might damage the picture, and I don't wish to spoil my reputation as an artist. You will keep your eyes on that point, or be prepared for the consequences."

Still covering the trembling bully with his weapon, the young artist advanced to the table, took the desperado's pistol, and came back to the camera.

"Five minutes. There is a good impression on the plate by this time. Still, to make sure, seeing it is a large size, too big for this establishment, and all of you may not be taken yet, we will continue the sitting a few moments more."

At the end of another minute the bully's face was livid. The artist, still with a glittering eye on him, put the cap over the camera.

The bully departed and left the photographer master of the field. The picture was a wonderful likeness, and the artist hung it and the pistol on the wall together, where they served the double purpose of an advertisement and a warning. He has never been again troubled by that visitor.—[Youth's Companion.

That Give Milk and Water.

If a tree produces bread, so-called, we should not be surprised to find one that gives milk, and such a one was discovered by Baron Von Humboldt in South America. It was called the palo de vaca by the natives, or "cow tree," and when the bark was pierced the sap that looked and tasted like milk ran out in a clear stream, forming a delicious and nutritious food.

The tree is a variety of evergreen very common in the higher regions of Venezuela, and the milk not only looks like that of the cow, but tastes like it, and the discovery was considered so valuable that attempts have been made to transplant it, though without success.

Equally remarkable is the Traveller's tree of Madagascar. It somewhat resembles the banana, but grows taller, the leaves extending upward, arranging themselves in a graceful fan-shape, the entire group resembling a gigantic fan forty feet in the air, formed of twenty-four or five leaves, each ten or twelve feet long.

It is called the Traveller's tree, as it takes the place of springs or wells, and in the dryest times, when all the pools and springs are exhausted, produces an abundant supply of clear pure water. This is obtained by cutting a hole or piercing the base of the leaf where it joins the tree, upon which a stream of water will flow that equals any spring—a welcome supply to the weary traveller.

It is also called the builder's tree, as houses are made of it, and water tight roofs from the leaves, the smaller ones of which are used as cloth and for various purposes.—[Golden Days.

A Joke on a Musician.

Handel had such a remarkable irritability of nerves, that he could not bear to hear the tuning of instruments, and therefore this was always done before he arrived at the theatre. A musical wag, who knew how to extract some mirth from Handel's irascibility of temper, stole into the orchestra on a night when the Prince of Wales was to be present, and untuned all the instruments. As soon as the Prince arrived, Handel gave the signal of beginning, con spirito; but such was the horrible discord, that the enraged musician started up from his seat, and having overturned a double-bass which stood in his way, he seized a kettle-drum, which he threw with such violence at the leader of the band, that he lost his full-bottomed wig by the effort. Without waiting to replace it, he advanced bare headed to the front of the orchestra, breathing vengeance, but so much choked with passion, that utterance was denied him. In this ridiculous attitude he stood staring and stamping for some moments, amidst a convulsion of laughter; nor could he be prevailed upon to resume his seat until the Prince went in person, and with much difficulty appeased his wrath.

While a settler on Cook's Bayou was in the back yard, the other day, assisting his wife in hanging a kettle, preparatory to washing, he was startled by the screams of a child left sitting near the open front door. Hurrying into the house he found a ten-foot alligator lying in the door-way, half of its body being in the house, and his open mouth withing six inches of the child's face.

As soon as he entered, the alligator took fright and wheeled into the water. But for his prompt appearance the child would have been carried away.

At Pendina, Mercato, and the Porto, on the contrary, in the little streets that twine and cross each other, where the Neapolitan fishermen and lazzaroni's live, the scavonger leave no trace behind them. There, in a side of the narrow, ill-paved street, runs a thin stream of black and evil-smelling mud. On either side the doors stand wide open, but it is very difficult to see clearly into these dark rooms, or rather dens, guarded as they are by gossiping females and romping children, the latter in semi or complete nakedness. When we do succeed in getting a glimpse into the interior we find a miserable bed almost worn to pieces, with here and there a heap of rags, a rickety chair, a table, and madonnas dressed up in gilt paper, all of which a sickly lamp that is never extinguished illuminates in a half-hearted manner. There is mud and refuse which emits a vile smell, but no one cares unless it be to buy a watermelon, upon which, as the Neapolitans say,

Si mangia, si beve,
Esi si lava la feccia.

Progression is not always easy outside, for the route is often impedded by other handbarrows and bearers waiting for their burden, so that in the vichis or little narrow streets there is frequently a perfect blockade. It is the duty of the guard to open a passage. At times the patient becomes restless on the litter, and pushing away the cloth which covers him, he exposes a face with a deathly pallor upon it. On other occasions—which are only too numerous—the bearers stop to drink, become weak in the legs and stumble. Sometimes, moreover, the sick person is upset and projected upon the passers by, who move about calmly, paying little heed to the cholera patients. There is a long procession of hand-barrows in the streets around the hospitals of Cannonchia and Piedigrotta. The bearers meet at the street corners, and silently form in single file. When tired they calmly stop to rest, and even sit down on their barrows, and then the parents, who frequently follow the bearers as far as the door of the hospital, take advantage of these stoppages to encourage the sick ones. The spectacles seen on the way are generally of a terrible character. The patients see funeral processions, terribly simple, with a hearse drawn by a pair of miserable jades, which the driver is obliged to lash unmercifully to make them move a little quicker.

The day before yesterday there was a crowd around the mairie in the Foria quarter. Some asked for doctors, others demanded priests or hearses. The cholera had been doing its fell work during the night, and the number of cases increased continually. As there was not sufficient employes to deal with the difficulty, the more impatient portion of the crowd began to shout, when the sound of a clarionet and other instruments was heard playing a spirited waltz. The musicians approached, and succeeded in making their way through the crowd, followed by a young couple in their Sunday best, who were come to be married before the mayor. The lady objected somewhat when she was obliged to go into the disinfecting room like any ordinary person. She feared for her white dress, which would be spoiled by the chlorine, and the gentleman complained as to his gloves, which were of a somewhat uncertain color. As soon, however, as they entered the apartment where the ceremony took place their gayety returned. A few minutes later they reappeared with smiling faces, and the musicians resumed their waltz air, and the doctors went to attend the dying.

Measuring Genius.

The great mass of what we call moral and useful men, practical men, and men of common sense are very useful men; they are the warp and woof of society, but they are not capable of understanding the heroic. Now and then it appears in a life, and we don't know where it came from. His father wasn't like that: his mother wasn't like that, but here comes a heroic nature that is careless of matter or physical comfort, or even of society and its proprieties and its pecurious reward, but who has a sense of beauty. It burns in him to develop it. For the sake of giving expression to that he is willing to waste his whole life. He has the artist's impulse to color, form, construct; it is in him, and for the sake of it he bears poverty, for the sake of it he says: "What though I am not known, I am working on the higher sense. Why should I expect the lower and vulgar crowd to understand me?' And they did not. If a man paints pictures and gets money, Oh! they can understand that, but not a man that paints portraits because it is in him, and he must do it without any relation to profit or any lower life whatever. Men who sing or sell their poems, we all understand them. They are on the market. Not that it is a discredit to them, but we interpret them because they are manufacturing things that bring money. But men that sing as old Homer sung, as Dante sung, as blind Milton sung, how we pity them! We look back and say: 'Oh, that they should have lived in such a dark age; they never got anything for it." They got themselves. They answered the highest and noblest impulses. We are all the time measuring men of genius by the lower standards of what are called practical common sense men, who are like machines turning out fodder for themselves and other animals.—[Henry Ward Beecher.

How They Make Putty.

The process of making putty is a very simple one. The principal ingredients are raw linseed oil and whiting. Marble dust is mixed with the whiting, and as it is much cheaper it reduces the cost of the putty. Paraffine oils are used to a great extent instead of linseed, and as the former is the cheaper and inferior oil of the two the result is to make an inferior article. To knead it, it is put in a chaser—an annular shaped trough from the centre of which rises a vertical shaft. From this shaft, two arms extend, on the ends of which are heavy iron wheels that rest in the trough. When the shaft revolves the wheels chase each other around the trough. The wholesale price of putty is about two cents a pound.

Impressive Scene Among Alaska Glaciers.

A vast ice field, the accumulation of ages, stretched back as far as the eye could reach, or rose still like seemingly limitless walls they met the horizon. Icebergs whose wondrous colorings and and grotesque formations exceeded our wildest imaginings, surrounded us on all sides. A huge blue pyramid growing fainter towards the apex where rested a mass of snowy whiteness, sailed slowly by to be followed by another, black at the waterline, growing bottle-green, lighter olive, and then by some inexplicable transformation becoming tipped with a delicate turquoise. Pinnacles, arches and domes in turn drifted by, till the speed of the Ancon was checked, and we found ourselves ready to drop anchor, while before rose a vertical ice-wall 500 feet in height and with a frontage of three and one-half miles. Not daring to attempt a pen picture, I quote the words of Muir, the State Geologist of California: "The whole front and brow of this majestic glacier is dashed and sculptured into a mass of yawning chasms and crevices, and a bewildering variety of strang architectural forms appalling to the strongest nerves, but novel and beautiful beyond description. Clusters of glittering, lance-tipped spires, gables and obelisks, bold out-standing bastions, and plain mural cliffs adorned along the top with fretted cornice and battlement, while every gorge and crevasse, chasm and hollow were filled with light shimmering and pulsing in pale blue tones of ineffable tenderness and loveliness." When at the firing of a cannon huge masses of ice became detached and plunged into the water with a force that threw the spray hundreds of feet in the air, and even at the distance we were, caused our steamer to sway violently, the excitement culminated, and the cheers of our party mingled with the echoes of the fall as the distant crags sent them back to us. We were landed on shore and after almost the entire afternoon spent climbing the side morraine, looking back at our ship, an atom in the distance, we returned feeling the half had not been told us.—[Correspondence Providence Journal.

Guides for Ghosts.

The Chinese hill-tribes believe that man has only three souls, and these are most satisfactorily disposed of. One appropriately and conveniently remains in the grave, another takes up his position at the ancestral board, and the third roams about unrestrained in the spirit world, not necessarily upon earth. Many of the women are fond, as in India, of giving their dead child a dog, or,—by dint of prayers and supplications—the departed soul of an old and experienced person as guide, that the infant wanderer may not miss its way on the path to the spirit world. For this reason it was that the Mongolians sent slaves to accompany their dead princes. The Chinese, however, have a more humane idea. They believe that, since it is likely that the dead man will be unable to find his way safely to the land of spirits, and may as probably as not stray from the right path, the kings of the under-world would furnish him with a little devil to act the part of guide and servant to the newly disembodied spirit on its journey. The Poles used to have a notion of a similar kind, though they, like the Chinese, did not display it in such an unpleasant way for survivors. It was their custom to lay bears claws in the grave, to serve the dead man as hooks, with the help of which he might climb the great glass mountain. According to the common notion among the Kareens, the dead renew as "plu-pho" in the world of Pin, under sovereignty of the great King Koetay, or Taeedo, the occupations which they had followed while as yet mortals upon earth—a most curious hint at the caste system of the Hindoos, which has no place with the Kareens while they are alive.—English Paper.

Destruction of a Swiss Glacier with Dynamite

One of the youngest, as well as one of the most beautiful, glaciers in the country is that which gives birth to the river Rhone, and the grandest sight in connection with the Rhone glacier is the supurb seracs or pinnacles of ice, which prove a source of unending attraction to travellers by the Furka pass. As is well known, the second and third bends of the road almost hang over the glacier, and afford a wonderful view of the stupendous ice fall, which, descending from precipitous rocks, is broken and twisted into fantastic pyramids. This sight, writes our Geneva correspondent, is certainly unique in that part of the Alps, but unless active steps are taken to stop the destruction now going on, it will soon be so no longer. It appears that some people have obtained permission—from whom it is not clear—to destroy these pinnacles by means of dynamite, in order that the huge blocks thus easily detached may be put on the St. Gothard railway, and so transported to Bale, where they are to be stored in immense wells for summer use. Should the destruction of the glacier be allowed to continue the authorities will find to their cost that they have killed the goose that laid the golden eggs, for the chief attration of that desolate region is the supurb ice pinnacles of the great glacier, and when they have disappeared travellers will turn their steps in other directions.—[London News.

The Spanish American.

The Spanish American is an inveterate gamester, while many who have studied the social economy of Mexico have held that the financial embarrassments of that fine country have been due no less to "pronunciamentos" than to the game of "monte." The Cuban, again, is one of the most determined and the best mannered of punters. Whether he gains or loses at card playing or cock-fighting, he rarely moves a muscle, and pockets handsful of gold doubloons, or sees the auriferous "cart wheels" swept away from him, with equal imperturbability. Every steamship that leaves Liverpool for an American port has among her passengers a portion of gentlemen who would smile and shrug their shoulders in contempt, or open their eyeswide with amazement, were they told that gaming was an offense against public morality, and was in the highest degree detrimental to the maintenance of good discipline on board ship. The Spanish American begins to gamble when he is a boy, and continues to gamble his whole life long; and a baccarat table on board a steamship would be by him regarded as a sweet boon, not only from its presenting a chance of winning a comfortable pile of dollars, but for its alleviation of the tedium of a sea voyage.—[London News.

WORDS OF WISDOM.

Love, like fear, makes us believe everything.

There can be no friendship where there is no freedom.

Frugality is founded on the principle that all riches have limits.

If you would not have affliction visit you twice, listen at once to what it teaches.

It is good discretion not to make much of any man at the first, because one cannot hold out that proportion.

To wish to do without our fellows and to be under obligation to no one is a sure sign of a soul void of sensibility.

True politeness is the last touch of a noble character. "It is the gold on the spire, the sun-light on the corn-field."

An old proverb says, "An unkind word falls easily from the tongue, but a coach and six horses cannot bring it back."

When a misfortune happens to a friend look forward and endeavor to prevent the same thing from happening to yourself.

Life, according to an Arabic proverb, is composed of two parts—that which is past, a dream; and that which is to come, a wish.

Deceit and falsehood, whatever conveniences they may for a time promise or produce, are, in the sum of life, obstacles to happiness.

We are linked both to the past and the future, and our duty to the former, well fulfilled, will best fit us to discharge our duty to the latter.

He that does not know those things which are of use, and necessary for him to know, but an ignorant man, whatever he may know besides.

Pride is like the beautiful acacia, that lifts its head proudly above its neighboring plants—forgetting that it, too, like them, has its roots in the dirt.

Every man has his domain and his clog, only it is looser and lighter to one man than another, and he is more at ease who takes it up than he who drags it.

Troubles spring from idleness, and grievous toils from needless ease; many, without labor, would live by their wits only, but they break for want of stock.

Conversation should be pleasant, without scurrility, witty without affectation, free without indecency, learned without conceitedness, novel without falsehood.

If you are willing to be as pleasant and as anxious to please in your own home as you are in the company of your neighbors, you will have the happiest home in the world.

Friendship without benefaction degenerates into a weak and worthless sentiment; benefaction without the spirit of friendship becomes a mechanical and lifeless routine.

A generous, a brave, a noble deed performed by an adversary, commands our approbation; while in its consequences it may be acknowledged prejudicial to our particular interests.

Whenever you commend, add your reasons for so doing; it is this which distinguishes the approbation of a man of sense from the flattery of sycophants and the admiration of fools.

Sarcasm always leaves its doubt and its depression. Human nature avenges itself by suspicion. There comes the internal and unerring whisper, "As others have been used so shall we."

A man should never put a fence of words around his ideas, because many who would otherwise give him a fair hearing, lack sufficient resolution to climb over such a rugged enclosure.

The Loss of the "Wasp."

When the British gunboat was lost with all save six on board she was bound for Lough Foyle to take the Sheriff and bailiffs to Instrahull to evict the inhabitants. The total rental of this speck in the ocean is £18. It is a small island on the seaboard of Donegal, and it is well known as the scene of the wreck of the Iris some few years back, when the hardy islanders, at great risk of life and limb, succeeded in rescuing the passengers and crew of the ill-fated steamer. The extreme length of the islet is three miles and the breadth one and a half miles. It is distant from the mainland about nine miles, and of all the desolate speaks of land it is the most uninviting. Sixteen families with the lighthouse keeper make up the entire population. There is no arable land, and the surface of the ground is formed of rocks. Some of the tenants have never paid any rent, and others are from ten to fifteen years in arrears. A precarious livelihood is earned at fishing during the summer months, but, owing to the stormy and dangerous nature of the coast in the winter, the islanders go to the mainland until the spring, as there is no fuel to be obtained on the islet. There is only one landing place, and it requires skill and care to run into it in safety. So the attempt to collect $90 has cost the British navy thousands of pounds and fifty-two lives.

A Pen and Ink Portrait.

A man of refined courtesy and pleasantness, who can make a flattering speech when needful, and yield to non essentials with grace, there is in Lord Dufferin, as in all successful Irishmen—in the Wellesleys, and the Lawrences, and the Wolseleys—an element of granite hardness and impenetrability, rising sometimes into pitilessness, indispensable to the man who is to govern, and not merely seem to govern, under Indian conditions. The sceptre which guides and controls a fifth of the human race must be of hard metal, and the man who cannot bear to punish may ruin provinces. Lord Dufferin can hang if needful, as he showed in Syria, or frighten opponents, as he showed on one great day in Constantinople, and is by no means, when pushed to the wall, the sweetly-soothing politician of which his career in Canada left in some minds an impression.

How Doth the Busy Little Moth.

It is astonishing what an appetite a moth has, and how many square inches of a $60 overcoat he can get away with in one short summer. They don't make any noise about it, but as soon as spring opens, and it becomes warm, their appetite reminds them that they have been lying quiet for some time, and so they go to work to eat enough to last all winter. When fall comes again and you take your overcoat off the hook, it looks as though it had been chewed by a buzz saw.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber lnd, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. Shelburne Post office was burglarized recently.

A STRONG ENDORSEMENT.

The Clergy, the Medical Faculty, the press and the people all endorse Burdock Blood Bitters as the best system renovating blood purifying tonic known. Its work bears out their best recommend.

The Meaford Baptist Church was opened last Sunday.

The Fifth Division Court of the County of Grey will hold its regular sittings in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on Thursday, October the 30th next.

A SAD NEGLECT.

Neglecting a constipated condition of the bowels is sure to bring ill-health and great suffering. Burdock Blood Bitters regulate the bowels in a natural manner. purifying the blood and promote a healthy action of the stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels.

Prof. Low's Sulphur Soap is highly recommended for the cure of Eruption, Chafes, Chapped Hands, Pimples, Tan, etc.

A SUCCESSFUL RESULT.

Mr. Bloomer, of Hamilton Ont., suffered for many years with a painful running sore upon one of his legs, which Baffled all attempts to heal until he used Burdock Blood Bitters, which speedily worked a perfect cure.

Quebec Parliament Buildings were blown up on Saturday.

PROMPT MEASURES.

Prompt means should be used to break up sudden colds and cure coughs in their early stages. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam does this most speedily and effectually.

The Great Northern Exhibition at Collingwood was a grand success.

AN AGREEABLE SURPRISE.

Those who try Burdock Blood Bitters as a regulator of the bowels, or to purify the blood, aid digestion, regulate the liver and kidneys, or strengthen tired nature, are agreeably surprised at the prompt benefit derived.

A DECIDED HIT.

Hagyard's Yellow Oil touches the right spot every time when applied for rheumatism, neuralgia, pain, soreness or lameness, and internally for colds, sore throat, etc., it is equally infallible.

Twenty-five candidates were confirmed recently in the English Church, Hanover.

Chatsworth town hall is to be opened the 1st week in November with a grand Concert. Clever.

The magical power over pain that Hagyard's Yellow Oil possesses, outrivals the marvels of ancient times. It acts in a natural manner to subdue inflammation; cures Rheumatism, Croup, Deafness, Sore Throat, and painful injuries.

An Oshawa man recovered $580 from an Oddfellows' Lodge for rough treatment while being initiated.

A GOOD RECORD.

Among the many thousand bottles of Hagyard's Yellow Oil sold annually in Canada not one has ever failed to give satisfaction. It cures rheumatism, colds and all painful complaints and injuries.

The Bruce Herald issued a daily edition during Walkerton fair. It was a neat, spicy sheet and reflects credit on the proprietor.

A GOOD TEST.

For over sixteen years G. M. Everest, of Forest, has sold Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, and its sales are steadily increasing. It cures coughs, colds and all lung complaints; is pleasant to take the always reliable.

National Pills acts promptly upon the Liver, regulate the Bowels and as a purgative are mild and thorough.

It is rumoured in London that Sir John Macdonald's visit to England will result in an arrangement, whereby the West India colonies will be admitted into the Dominion of Canada a confederation that, Earl Derby says, has the approval of the home Government.

A REMARKABLE RECOVERY.

A council of doctors declared Mrs. Adelaide O'Brien, of 372 Exchange St., Buffalo, incurable. Her liver was badly disordered; she vomited green mucous; could retain no food; skin yellow and full of humors. She was rapidly sinking, but Burdock Blood Bitters Cured her.

Dr. Low's Worm Syrup has removed tape worm from 15 to 20 feet in length. It also destroys all kinds of worm.

A CURE FOR CHOLERA MORBUS.

A positive cure for this dangerous complaint, and for all acute or chronic forms of Bowel Complaint incident to summer and fall, is found in Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry; to be procured from any druggist.

Euphrasia Council.

The council met pursuant to adjournment on the 3rd Oct., 1884. Members all present. Minutes of last session of council read and confirmed, except one resolution, which was rescinded, as follows:—

Moved by Mr. Hurd, seconded by Mr. Fawcett, that a resolution, passed last meeting of council, authorizing the Reeve to get a deviation surveyed at lot 30, 11th line, be rescinded, as this council deems it unwise to proceed with said work at present.—Carried.

A resolution was passed to establish the present survey of the Valley road, in the 5th con.

The Treasurer was authorized to deposit the interest accruing on the money deposited as sinking fund in the Canada Permanent Building & Savings Society.

By-law 340, for closing part of the original allowance of road between this township and Artemesia, carried through the different stages and passed.

The collector was ordered to strike 78 cents from his roll, being the taxes of the late Wm. Martin for 1883.

An order in favor of Robert Johnston, issued at last meeting of council, was withdrawn, as the work has not been performed.

The amount of $2, charged for statute labor against S½ lot 5, con. 5, struck off Collector's Roll, as it is made to appear that said work was performed.

The Reeve's orders were issued on the Treasurer to pay as follows, viz:—James Paterson, Esq., $2.50, to pay men for road work; John Dillon, $6.25, road work; Thomas Jordan, $50, salary as collector for 1883; Joseph Howe, $12, road work; Robt. Conn, $5, road work; Robt. Clark, $10, road work; Robt. Camplin, $7.50 road work; Hamilton Conn, $16.72, road work; Irwin Fawcett, $8.17, road work; W. J. Laugheed, $7.84, road work; R. H. Stinson, $4, road work.

On motion being made and seconded, the council adjourned until the first Friday in November next.

ROBERT DUNLOP,
Clerk.

A NEW ERA FOR DAIYMEN.

The best churn made.

The Atmospheric Tempering Churn. The latest and only common sense churn before the public, is made on the old and reliable up and down dash principle, with air chamber and lever power attachments, making it very easily worked, a child being able to do the churning. But the principal charm is the tempering arrangement. This churn is made with two bottoms, one three inches above the other, forming an air chamber in which can be poured Hot or Cold water, as the season requires, either warming or cooling the air which rises in a pipe from the air chamber with the up stroak of the dash, and is forced down from under the plunger with the downward stroke into the cream, thereby obth purifying and tempering the cream by pure Hot or cold air, as required during the process of churning, doing away with the necessity of using Hot or cold water in connection with the cream; which is a great injury to the cream for making good keeping butter. This churn is only to be seen to be desired. The most competent judges (the farming community) wherever it has been introduced assert it is without doubt the best churn in Canada; and the price—Six Dollars—brings it within reach of the rich and poor.

A RARE PLANT.

The Wild Strawberry Plant possesses rare virtue as a cleansing, cooling, astringent, anteseptic and healing medicine, and when combined with other valuable vegetable extracts, as in Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, it is an unfailing remedy in all bowel complaints.

SCOTT ACT PETITION.—When the petition for the submission of the Scott Act in Grey was deposited in the Register Office on the 20th ult., we stated that the total voters in the county, according to the latest return we had then at hand (1882) was 14,489, but that they would no doubt be an increase since that time, and that possible some names might be struck off on a scrutiny, although it was not likely that they would diminish the list below the requisite number. It now appears that those who had charge of the getting up the petitions miscalculated the number of voters now in the county, and were not careful enough in the signatures they obtained. When the petition had lain the requisite time in the Registry Office, it was removed to verify the number of voters before forwarding to the Secretary of State. It was ascertained from the Clerk of the Peace that the total voters in the county qualified on 20th September was 15,443 (Durham, Glenelg, Osprey, Proton and Sullivan being the only municipalities whose lists for 1884 were then disposited.) This would require a petition of 3861 to make the requisite one fourth. There were actually 4047 names on the petition; but the scrutiny of them, completed last Friday, showed that there were 276 names of non-voters, and on these being struck off it left the petition 90 short of the requisite number. We understand it is intended to go on and secure a sufficiont number of names; but this will necessitate giving a new notice and again depositing the petition, which will delay the vote so long that it cannot possibly be taken in time to take effect in May next, if it should be carried. The vote must be taken at least a hundred and fifty days before the 1st of May for the Act to go into forcethen—if less than that time, it does not take effect till a year from 1st of May.—*O. S. NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER III.

So little did I realize or understand this new sensation which possessed my whole being that I laughed again when Lady Saxon drove over to the hall and we spent two long hours in discussing her son.

"I like to speak to you about Nello," she said; "you seem to understand him. I know that talking about him so frequently is a weakness of mine, and at times I see a half-satirical smile on the faces of many of my listeners; but you never smile and never tire—you understand."

So, from the day on which we stood side by side before his portrait, the young lord seemed to form a tie between the mother and myself.

Aunt Annette was much amused at the ardent friendship which Lady Saxon had evinced for me.

"If you were Lady Saxon's own daughter, she could not care more for you," she would say to me.

Why did those simple words, so carelessly uttered, touch my very heart? Of course he would come home some day, and I should see him; and he would talk to me this dreamer of dreams, because his mother loved me. Then my thoughts would become confused and my heart beat more quickly than ever.

One morning Lady Saxon drove over with a bundle of letters from her son to read to me. They were dated from different places, and in several of them he spoke of coming home; but no definite time was mentioned.

"He may come at any time now," said Lady Saxon—"at any hour. If Heaven will but give me my son once again, he shall not leave me. I with he would marry."

As she spoke she fixed her eyes on my face, and my instinct told me that in her heart she added, "I wish he would marry you:" and that look in her eyes was often there when she spoke to me of Lord Saxon.

It was early in June, and the world seemed a paradise of beauty, fragrance, and song the great magnolia trees on the lawn were all in bloom, and the light breeze wafted the perfume of myriads of flowers. I had some fine white jessamine that was in the full perfection of beauty, and, as Lady Saxon was very fond of it, I resolved to drive over and take her some. The birds were trilling their tuneful lays, the bank and hedges were resplendent with clusters of wild flowers, whilst the wind played musically as it rustled gently among the leaves of the lime trees. All nature appeared in its brightest garb and in its gayest mood. To my girlish fancy, excited by always hearing of the young lord, the birds sang "Nello" in their shrill sweet voices and the wind whispered "Nello" to the green lime leaves that had on them a half golden glow.

I drove through the wealth of rich summer foliage and flowers, always keeping in view the murmuring sea, as it rolled lazily in the golden sunlight, until I came to Dunroon's stately mansion.

A groom came out and relieved me of the high spirited ponies.

"Her ladyship is in the garden, Miss Gordon," he said, knowing that I always made my way straight to her wherever she was.

Yes; her ladyship was in the garden, her hands full of crimson roses, and a light on her pleasant face such as I had never seen there before.

"Felice," she cried, when she saw me—she always used the French form of my name—"Felice, what good angel has brought you here?"

"I came to bring you this," I answered, holding out the odorous jessamine. "Let me twine it with your roses," I said; and, lo, she was looking at me with tears in her eyes!

"This is not the only welcome gift that has come to me to-day," she murmured to herself. "Come with me, Felice; I have something to show you," she said; and I followed her, my hands filled to overflowing with fragrant flowers.

She led the way to a pretty little drawing room, called Sea View room, from the fact that a magnificent view of the sea, of the stretch of yellow sand, and of the blue waters that came rolling in, breaking into sheets of white foam could be obtained from the long wide windows. She entered the room quietly, and I followed. By the open window, intently watching the inrolling of the waves, stood a tall young man; and, when he turned at the sound of our entrance, I saw the face of Lord Saxon—"Nello," as the birds, the leaves, and the wind sang it; "Nello," as the word fell like two notes of liquid music from his mother's lips; but Lord Saxon to me. As she had taken me to see his portrait, so she now brought me to see him in person. She led me to him.

"Nello," she said, "this is my new neighbor, Miss Felicia Gordon, the 'Felice' of whom I have written so often. Though I am an old lady and she a young one, we are very fast friends."

"My mother's friends are always mine," he said, holding out his hand to me in the most cordial manner.

I wish I could describe what I then felt. In our lives there are moments so full of emotion that they seem to mark a turn in them that we never reach again.

This was such a moment for me. I could not describe it. At first I felt almost a shock, as though the picture had suddenly come to life and the dark tender eyes were again smiling down into mine. Then I saw the dancing waves crest-tipped by the powerful rays of the summer sun, I saw the yellow sands, and the gently-waving foliage of the trees on the lawn, I saw the bouquet of fragrant flowers that I held in my hands. Ah me, to this day the sight and the scent of those flowers vividly bring back the past to me! When I look at them, Swinburne's line comes home to me with singular force—

"I shall never again be friends with roses."

And then I raised my eyes and looked at the original of the picture that had so strangely fascinated me. It was as though I had raised them to the warm noon-day sun, as though a thrill of fever passed through my veins; my heart beat violently, my face flushed, some of the flowers fell unheeded to the ground. I remembered what his mother had said, that all women who looked into his face loved him. Did I? The very thought made me tremble; but it was not with fear. He was speaking to me, of what I hardly knew, for in the spell his presence cast over me I saw nothing but the surpassing loveliness of his marvellous face. All the attributes of a noble character were delineated in it, and it had an indefinable something which, without my knowing it drew my heart from my breast and kept it.

"What a glorious bouquet you have," he was saying; "and how beautiful they are! I did not know that red roses and white jessamine went so well together."

"That is Felice's taste," said Lady Saxon; "and it is perfect."

"It is like herself," he remarked, with a glance of unmistakable admiration.

Ten minutes later I was sitting on the couch by the great window. Lady Saxon had taken off my hat and mantle, her son had relieved me of my burden of flowers and I was at home with them—happy, light of heart, but with a strange sensation of almost terrified delight, something quite new to me. I could not tell which was the greater, the pleasure or the pain of it. I did not often look at him; but my ears drank in every word that he uttered. I had never before known the charm of a good talker, and to me the flow of his words was like listening to a strain of sweet music. He had a low, clear, cheery voice, and a laugh that it did one good to hear. Looking back on that day, I blame myself. No girl ought to give her love unasked. It is unmaidenly, undignified; but it was more Lady Saxon's fault than mine. She had sown the seed, and I was to reap the harvest.

Lady Saxon begged me to stay for the day, and, assuming that she had my consent, ordered the carriage to fetch aunt Annette. It was a day of days! I could no more describe it than I could paint the rose, the gold, and the purple that flush the morning sky. It was the day on which my soul woke to maturity; and the dawning of that new life was terrible, even in its beauty. It was brightest sun and deepest shadow—sun when the light of his face was turned upon me, when he spoke to me, when he showed me any gracious little act of attention; shade when he was absent or engrossed with another.

We were out on the lawn under the white magnolia-tree, and he was talking to me of the power of its perfume. When we came to the sweet syringa-trees, he told me a legend of one of his ancestresses, who broke off a spray to give to her lover when he was going to the wars, and it was returned to her dyed with his heart's blood,

"It was taken from this very tree," he said.

After dinner, when we were out under the cypress, Lord Saxon told me how often his mother had written about me, and how well he knew the name of Felicia Gordon.

"There was one surprise in store for me," he said, with a smile. "I thought you were a staid matronly lady, and I found you a young girl. I was astonished when I saw your face behind that great mass of flowers."

I longed with all my passionate young heart to ask him if he had found my face fair, if it had pleased him. But no—he must never know that his mother had made me love him before he returned home. And, as we stood under the dark boughs of the cypress, watching the sun set over the river and the pine-woods, these words came into my mind—

"My mother, list'ning to my sleep,
Heard nothing but a sigh at night—
The short sigh rippling on the deep,
When hearts run out of breath and sight
Of men to God's clear sight.

"When others named thee thought thy brows
Were straight and tender—'Here
He comes between the vineyard rows!'
I said not 'Ay,' nor waited, dear,
To feel thee step too near."

I would be like the girl in the song, I determined. No one should know, no one should even guess my secret; no one should read it in my face, or hear it in my voice, or see it shining in my eyes. It never need be, never should be known. I could and would guard my secret.

At last this day of supreme happiness came to an end. There could be no other like it, just as though there could be no other second sunrise, no second birth of lily or rose. It was the first dawn of love, delicious yet bewildering.

I drove home with aunt Annette under the light of the stars, but I did not see them. When I raised my face to the heavens, I saw only the face of Nello, Lord Saxon.

CHAPTER IV.

"Do you like my son, Felice?" asked Lady Saxon, some days afterwards. "Is he what you expected to find him? Did I describe him well?"

I did not dare to look straight at her when I answered the question; but I saw a smile on her lips.

He had been home a fortnight then, and I had forgotten what life had been like before he came to Dunroon. The past and the future held no charm for me. I had no thought but for the present, with its unalloyed happiness, its ravishing delight.

We never tired of each other, for we had, after all many ideas and tastes in common. He was an excellent talker, I a good listener. No one seemed to think it strange that we passed long hours together. Lady Saxon made no comment, my aunt no remark. Few days passed without an invitation to Dunroon; and, if we did not accept it, Lord Saxon would come to Jesmond Dene. And every morning the delight, the novelty, with its mixture of passionate happiness and transient pain, grew stronger upon me. He was a dreamer of dreams, a lover of beauty, poet and artist in one. But, to my thinking, there was no one else like him—he stood alone.

He never even hinted at love; yet he was always kind, gentle, and attentive; and I felt sure he admired me, for he had made many sketches of me. I flattered myself that my love for him was carefully concealed, that no one knew of it, that it was hidden in the innermost recesses of my heart.

"Nothing is better, I well think,
Than love; the hidden well-water
Is not so delicate to drink."

I felt sure he was growing to love me, for there was between us an intangible something denoting a stronger feeling than friendship. When he spoke to me, his voice had a low and tender tone; when he looked at me, his eyes shone with evident admiration. I had a sure conviction that he thought of me, remembered my words, studied to please me—and was not that growing love?

One evening we stood together by a picturesque acacia, and, carelessly gathering a spray of it, I held it out to him.

"There are not many fairer flowers," I said; and, as he took it from me, he kissed my hand.

On another occasion we were standing in the library, both searching for a book, which he found; and, as he stooped to give it to me, he touched my brow with his lips. In that moment all the brightness and sweetness of heaven seemed to be showered upon me. He was learning to love me! And he kissed me again in the woods, when we wandered thither to listen to the nightingales. And, as we strolled on in the silvery moonlight which pierced the leafy canopy above us, with only the musical thrill of the birds breaking the silence, I thought how applicable these lines were to me—

"First time he kissed me, he but only kissed
The fingers of this hand wherewith I write;
And ever since it grew more clear and bright,
Slow to world-greetings, quick with its 'Oh, list!'
When the angels speak. A ring of amethyst
I could not wear here plainer to my sight
Than that first kiss. The second passed in height
The first, and sought the forehead, and half missed
Half falling on the hair. Oh, beyond meed
That was the chrism of love, which love's own crown
With sanctifying sweetness did precede!
The third upon my lips was folded down,
Two perfect purple states, since when ended
I have been proud, and said, 'My love, my own!'"

In all England there was no place so famous for nightingales as Jesmond Dene. There was a whole colony of the sweet songsters in the trees that grew near the pine forest, and they sang as surely never nightingales sang elsewhere. I listened to them often, when it seemed to me that they wiled by their melodious music the very heart from my breast. But one evening—we had been at Dunroon all day—I was talking enthusiastically of the nightingales, when most of the guests present expressed a wish to hear them, and it was arranged that, as it was a fine moonlit night, we should all drive back to Jesmond Dene and stroll to the woods; afterwards the guests were to take some refreshment at the Hall, and then return home.

"It will be a beautiful evening, Felicia," said Lord Saxon to me—by this time mother and son had both learned to address me by my Christian name.

From the moment we left Jesmond Dene until we reached the woods it was all a happy dream to me. I did not notice how the different groups arranged themselves; all I knew was that a voice the very tone of which made my heart vibrate with joy said—

"Felicia, let us walk together."

Lord Saxon was looking into my face; and with a fluttering heart and a deep color rising to my cheeks I turned to accompany him.

Slowly we walked by the great sombre trees, listening to the river as it rushed past the projecting rocks in its seemingly mad haste to reach the sea; at the silent twinkling stars as they kept their vigil in the heavens above. There can never again come such a night for me.

I look back to that evening as the one perfectly happy evening of my life. It was not the full sunrise of love; it was the fresh tremulous dawn. Lord Saxon said little, and the silence that fell between us was more eloquent than words.

"Through his words the nightingales
Drove straight and full their clear long call,
Like arrows through heroic mails;
And love was awful in it all—
The nightingales, the nightingales!"

It was on this occasion that he kissed my lips; and I vowed that no other's kiss should ever lie there. A nightingale that had been singing melodiously suddenly flew from one tree to another, and we watched the flight of the bird in the pale light of the moon.

"Look, Felicia," cried Lord Saxon; "it is there!"

I looked up eagerly, and then, as my face was lowered again, he caught it and kissed my lips; while I heard him whisper, "Ever dearest Felicia!" The music of his voice and the sweetness of the caress seemed to me one. Then footsteps and laughing voices drew near us, and the charm was dispelled. But in that moment I learned what many pass a long life without learning—the very ecstacy of love.

"You have caught the moonlight in your eyes, Felicia," said aunt Annette, when we entered the brilliantly-lighted drawing-room. "You look dazed."

So I was; but it was with happiness and love, not with the light of the moon. When our visitors prepared to depart, aunt Annette and I accompanied them to the end of the lawn. Oh fair white moon, never again will you shine for me with the same light! Never more will rose-leaf and lily-bloom be so sweet; never again will summer wind waft me such love-laden messages!

He held my hand tightly in his own as we walked across the lawn to the drive where the carriage was in readiness. As we passed the cluster of acacia-trees, he said, bending down, and looking tenderly into my eyes—

"I shall never forget this night, Felicia."

"Nor shall I," I answered."

"What does it all mean, Felicia?" he asked. What do the nightingales sing? What thrills in the air and shines in the stars? What is it, my—my darling? Do you know?"

I bowed my head—ah me!—as I answered "Yes."

"I will come to-morrow," he whispered, "and tell you what it means. Good night, Felicia."

"Just as Good as Divorced."

A well-known Detroit clergyman, who has one of the largest congregations in town, as well as the largest capacity to appreciate a joke, relates that one day last week he was called upon to marry a couple. His catechism of the prospective bridegroom was satisfactory and he then turned his attention to the lady.

"Have you ever been married?" was asked.

"Yes, sir."

"Husband dead?"

"No, sir,"

"Are you divorced?"

"N-no not exactly, but I'm just as good as divorced. My husband left me, and besides, we never paid the minister for marryin' us."

Among fine minds, men and women are more truly felt than seen. We meet people of the plainest appearance and most unostentatious manner, and yet without effort they compel us to respect them.

A rill, had it concious life, would never forget the pebble that defected its course from one ocean to another; human life as it flows onward cannot fail to recognise events, trivial in themselves, which nevertheless gave direction to all the future.

AMONG OUR EXCHANGES.

Girls who run away with their fathers' male servants are now called "lilies of the valet."

A Chicago man died while waiting in a drug store for a prescription. Most men do not die while waiting for a prescription; they only turn gray.

Southern woman said to me of her neighbor, who accepted attentions from a gentleman this woman disliked: "I do hope she will not marry him. I stay awake nights to hate him!"

How funny things work around! Sin brought clothes into the world, and if it were not for sin nobody would go to church, for had it not been for sin there would be no clothes to show there.

"So you want my autograph in your book, do you?" said Mrs. Parvenu to a little girl. "Well, honey, I'm real sorry, but I hain't had a pioter took since I was married, and I can't give it to you."

"What do you think of this reception?" asked the leader of a vigilance committee, as he placed a rope around a horse thief's neck. "I wouldn't mind it a particle if it were a little less cordial," was the significant reply.

Mrs. Mixit—"I don't get the hang of this Chinese fuss." Mr. M.—"What is it you don't understand, my dear?" Mrs. M.—"Well, first, I don't what Li Hung Chang for, and then——" Mr. M.—"My dear, you should remember that you are a woman and not try to understand such things."

A married man is not without his troubles. A Somerville man hunted all over the house the other day for his tobacco box, and was about abandoning the search in despair, when his wife informed him that she had used it to pack her bathing suit in, to preserve the dress from the moths.

Overset from the omnibus: A.—"Of what sickness is the Mrs. B. dead?" B.—"Exactly know they not; perhaps because she too fast lived." A.—"How so?" B.—"At her marriage was she, according to her own story, three years younger than her husband, and after her death was she, according to the birth and death certificate, nine years older than the same."

The origin of the expression "where the shoe pinches" is thus given: "Plutarch relates the story of a Roman who was divorced from his wife. This person being highly blamed by his friends, who demanded "Is she not chaste? is she not fair?" held out his shoe and asked them whether it was not new and well made. "Yet," added he, "none of you can tell where it pinches me."

How the impertinent Mrs. Cass was salted down: Mr. Jack Cass, who is considerable of a donkey in his way, had been particularly pert the other evening. Finally he said something to Miss Sharp that was just too saucy for anything. "Why don't you box his ears?" asked one of the girls. "I would," replied Miss Sharp, "only I don't know where I can find a box big enough."

"Your son William is in the city, I understand, Mrs. Ploughit?" remarked Mrs. Calfer. "Will he learn a trade?" "Oh, my, no! He has entered the professions." "Ah, which one?" "He has adopted that of an artist, ma'am. The last we heard of him was through a friend who said he was engaged in painting the town red."

Sweets of the honeymoon: Husband—"Hulda, dear, as I was passing through our garden I saw some asparagus ready for cooking; perhaps you would like to go and gather the first fruit of the season yourself?" Young wife (anxious to conceal her ignorance in the vegetable department): "I tell you what Adolphus, we will go together; you shall pluck it and I will hold the ladder."

A correspondent of a family magazine wants to know how to boil cabbage without the disagreeable odor of cooking filling nearly every room in the house. The plan is very simple and effective. Place a piece of old rubber shoe on the stove while the cabbage is boiling. The aroma of the rubber kills the odor of the cabbage—and you will probably want to kill the person who suggested the plan, after you have tried it.

An Austin negro, familiarly known as "Rabbit Hash," has returned to Austin after an absence of several years. "Where have you been all this time?" asked Uncle Mose. "Where's I been? I'se been to Mezzico." "How do you like it dar?" "De country am mighty fine, but de Mezzicans am de stupidest folks I has struck yet." "So dey am not so peart as de culled folks?" "Lawd no. I libbed right among 'em foah yeahs, and when I left 'em dey didn't understand me a bit more den when I fust kom dar. Dey am de slowest folkes to larn I has struck yet."

"I understand that you have stopped practising?" said the Secretary of State to an eminent colored physician. "Yas, sah; 'cluded ter 'gin up de trade an' go to preachin', In dis country dar-hin't no money ter be made in de practicin' of medicine. Why, sah, of I had er 'voted my time ez close ter suthin' else ez I has ter business, I would er been putty well off by dis time Ober two-thirds o' my patients neber paid me, sah." "Why didn't you sue them?" "'Twouldn't done no good, 'case da wuz dead, sah. I got de wus' class o' patients. None o' em neber had no health an' constitution."

Needless Criticism.

What is the good of seeing holes in people's coats when we can't mend them? Talk of my debts if you mean to pay them: if not, keep your red rag behind your ivory ridge. A friend's faults should not be advertised, and a stranger should not be published. He who brays at an ass is an ass himself, and he who makes a fool of another is a fool himself. Don't get into the habit of laughing at people, for the old saying is "Hanging's stretching, and mocking catching." Jesting is too apt to turn into jeering, and what was meant to tickle makes a wound. It is a pity when my mirth is another man's misery. Before a man cracks a joke he should consider how he would like it himself; for many who give rough blows have very thin skins. Give only what you would be willing to take; some men throw salt on others, but they smart if a pinch of it falls on their own raw places. When they get a Roland for their Oliver, or a tit for their tat, they don't like it; yet nothing is more just. Biters deserve to be bitten.—[Spurgeon.

Name Evolution.

Emigration is a much more serious matter than revolution. Virtually, it is obliteration. Thus, Gerard Petit, landing upon the coast of South Carolina in the days of French confusion, gave his wife and children over to that oblivion. Turning his face westward, he pushed his way to the mountains. He had begun his journey fired with the despair of an exile, and he ended it with something of the energy and enterprise of a pioneer. In the foot-hills of the mountains he came to the small stream of English colonists that was then trickling slowly southward through the wonderful valleys that stretch from Pennsylvania to Georgia, between the foot hills of the Blue Ridge and the great Cumberland range. Here, perhaps for the first time, the je, vous, nous of France met in conflict the "un-vi," the "we-uns" and the "you-uns" of the English-Pennsylvania Georgians. The conflict was brief. There was but one Gerard Petit, and, although he might multiply the je, vous, nous by the thousands and hundreds of thousands, as he undoubtedly did, yet in the very nature of things the perpetual volly of "you-uns" and "we-uns" must carry the day. They belonged to the time, and the climate suited them. By degrees they fitted themselves to Gerard Petit; they carried him from the mountains of South Carolina to the mountains of North Georgia, and there they helped him build a mill and found a family. But their hospitality did not end there. With the new mill and new family they gave him a new name. Gerard Petit, presumably with his hand upon his heart, as became his race made one last bow to genealogy. In his place stood Jerd Poteet, "you-uns" to the right of him, "we-uns" to the right of him. He made such protest as he might. He brought his patriotism to bear upon the emergency, and named his eldest son Huguenin Petit. How long this contest between hospitality on the one hand and family pride and patriotism on the other was kept up, it is unnecessary to inquire. It is enough to say that the Huguenin of one generation left Huge Poteet, as his son and heir; Hugue left Hague, and this Hague, or a succeeding one, by some mysterious development of fate, left Teague Poteet. Meanwhile the restless stream of English-Pennsylvania Georgians, with its "you-uns" and its "we-uns," trickled over into Alabama, where some of the Petits were carried with it became Pettys and Pettuses.

"Taken at the Flood."

Every reader of history knows the story how the gallant Sir Walter Raleigh spread his cloak beneath the royal feet of Elizabeth and was rewarded with his sovereign's smile and speedy restoration to favor. Potemkin, the favorite of Catherine II, and the founder of the powerful Russian family which bears his name, would doubtless have remained an obscure soldier had not a trivial incident—a chance, in fact,—changed his destiny. After Catherine had deposed her weak husband and herself assumed the sceptre, she was accustomed to parade the streets of St. Petersburg, sword in hand, at the head of her troops. One day Potemkin noticed her sword bore no knot. He boldly stepped forward, braving the knout for his insubordination, and offered his. It was accepted it, and struck by the handsome young lieutenant, asked his name and regiment and if he would not like to serve in the palace. Haul Pasha, the Sultan's Chief of Artillery and most trusted vizier, was a dinner. Employed in the palace, he offered to mend a valuable French clock, as no clockmaker was available, and did his work so well that the Sultan had him lay aside his dinner's service and new him. Robt. Wilson, one of England's gentlemen, owes his elevation from a desk in a solicitor's office to a chance meeting with the Duke of York in the rain. Geo. Stephenson, the inventor of the locomotive, was born with a taste for mechanics. At a very tender age he was compelled to work as a pit-boy at twopence a day to help support the family. Deep in the mines, shut off from everything that cheered the sense, young Stephenson found much to stimulate his mechanical bent. He mastered the hoisting machinery and longed to be allowed charge of it. One day the engineer chanced to stumble and injure himself. Young Stephenson promptly offered to supply the place and proved his skill so well that the mine superintendent gave him permanent charge of the machinery, and thus gave him an opportunity to observe and think and think and build until the Rocket appeared as a result of his labors.

Migratory Plants.

There are nine species of hickory in the United States and one in Mexico. The Mexican species has a four-winged fruit and our species, which is its nearest geographical neighbor. Some plants have migrated the same as individuals and it is no more uncommon to see a foreign species of plant growing on our shores than it is to see a Chinaman. This is illustrated by the shortia in the mountains of Carolina and our May apple. At other times a whole flora will migrates just as the northern plants migrated southward along our mountain ranges during the glacial period, forced on by the mass of ice, until they found a climate similar to the one they left. Numerous specimens of European plants have taken root in our country that doubtless came through Behring's Strait, their course being unmistakably marked, although the cause of their migration remains unknown. There are invisible plants, without stem, leaf or root and without a green thing about them, or yet they are plants as surely as the oak tree. Such plants are alleged to produce diphtheria, splenic fever, consumption and Asiatic cholera. These plants can be carried long distances by air. They are found in large numbers in diseased persons, but disappear rapidly as the patient recovers. Persons living in districts where the water is impure should resort to artesian wells or springs, and if these are not handy, boil the water or add a little lime juice, the acetic acid of which destroys the plant and renders it harmless as a carrier or producer of disease.

In most of the New England fishing villages every married woman is spoken of as "the wilder" so and so. Her husband may be in the best of health at the time, but they use the handle so as to get accustomed to it. It's only a question of time.

AGRICULTURAL.

Sweet Corn as a Forage Plant.

One of the lessons of the year, which has been most forcibly taught, has been the value of sweet corn as a forage plant. I do not mean the spindling, washy, fodder corn most farmers are foolish—lazy—enough to grow; but fodder corn which has an ear to it. There cannot be too much of this kind of food on any farm. Next year the area here will be four times as great—all sweet corn. The seed is now ready to pluck—both early and late varieties. There is more food to be obtained in an acre of sweet fodder corn than of any crop; the work is less and it pays several hundred per cent. profit. Mine was grown as follows; the ground was covered with manure—mind, I say "covered," not sprinkled. This was plowed under; the ground harrowed and furrows made three feet apart: the seed was then scattered in the furrows by hand, and a harrow was run lengthwise over the furrows to cover it. The same work may be done with a drill. As soon as the corn was well up, a cultivator was run through once in a row, and twice afterwards it was cultivated, working close up to the corn. Once it was gone over, and the weeds in the rows pulled out. There was no hoeing, as it was not necessary. It was kept mellow and clean.

Cutting up Corn.

For the curing of corn there is probably no better mode, taking into account the value of the fodder, than by cutting at the roots, placing in stocks, and so allowing to stand until sufficiently dried. The mode of using a horse with pin, about which to form the stock, may answer a good purpose. and prove convenient, but forgreater security to the stock itself, the arrangement of the stalks about a single hill that is left standing seems to serve a good purpose. In the adoption of this mode, convenience seems to select five rows at each cutting, giving two rows on each side of the one upon which the stook is placed. With average corn, twenty-five hills will form a good sized stook, and being bound at the top by bending down the spindles, and almost invariably stand erect, erect, admit of a free circulation of air, and the proper curing of the fodder. When a horse is employed, unless especial pains are taken, the stocks, with the weakening of the stalks by curing, are apt to become blown down, resulting in injury to both grain and fodder. It is always safe to commence cutting corn as soon as the kernels have become a little hardened by being seared over. Of three different modes tested some years ago, by S. F. West, viz: by topping, cutting up as indicated above, and allowing to stand undisturbed until husked, there was a marked advantage in weight of grain in favor of cutting up when the grain had commenced to harden.

Diseased Potatoes.

Farmers have not been seriously troubled with diseased potatoes for a number of years, until the present, in this vicinity. Last season, while stopping at Quissett, Mass., I noticed that potatoes were quite extensively diseased, and that where, in some instances, they had been dug early, and placed in the cellar, they had to be removed and sorted over, sustaining a very great loss from decay. At that time, in the adjoining State of Connecticut, but little effect was observed, nothing sufficient to cause any change from the usually pursued course regarding digging or storing; but this season the condition of things is considerably changed. August was not severely hot, but the early part of September witnessed an extremely hot wave, and with that there was an apparent change in the health and vigor of the potatoe, which resulted in premonitions of decay by which it was rapidly followed, and to a large extent. Some thought to arrest the disease by digging the crop, but no such result was obtained; the seeds of disease had taken root and developed in the mass of stored tubers At the present time very few are doing anything in the line of digging, preferring to wait until decay has exhausted its energies, and then if any are left, they will be harvested.

Water Soaked Apples.

I have observed especially in the variety known as the King of Tompkins Co., a tendency to be heavily water soaked, a condition which is difficult of accounting for. I have, on previous occasions, observed a similar condition on a small scale, in the case of fall Pippins and Chesboro Russets, and in fact, one is liable to come across a single specimen of water soaked apple with any variety. Now the question arises. What is the cause of this condition? It is not because of lying upon the ground, because our apples were picked from the tree and had not come in contact with the earth. But I observed certain facts which may have had an influence in producing this condition, and may not. I can only state my observations, and leave the matter for the investigation of the scientific student.

In the first place. from about the first of September, the temperature for about two weeks was excessively hot; in the case of the fruit named upon the surface turned towards the midday sun, there was the appearance of having been super-heated, and where this condition exists, was also found the water soaked condition. Another fact was also noticeable, and that was, that the conditions named, existed only upon those portions of the trees most exposed, or facing the south; hence, upon the interior of the tree, or upon its northerly side, no water soaked apples were found. Whether there is any connection of the different conditions named, and the result mentioned, I am not prepared to state, but simply mention the same that others may give expression to any items of experience or observation touching similar cases.

Caring for Tuberose Bulbs.

The tuberose has long been admired, and was formerly considered to be beyond the care and cultivation of the farmer's wife; a sort of hot-house product to be obtained only by an expenditure of money, but it is now common to find this beautiful member of the floral kingdom in the flower garden, which has become almost as important upon the farm as the vegetable garden.

The chief point to be considered in managing tuberose bulbs is their extreme tenderness; this is to be provided for in the planting, if they are set in the ground, in the lifting of them in the fall, and in the keeping of the bulbs through the winter. If they are exposed to frost, either in the spring, before lifting, or during winter, they will be greatly damaged if not wholly destroyed. For that reason, in the fall, they should be taken from the ground before there is any danger of a killing frost, because if the top is badly frozen the influence extends to the bulb. They should be exposed in a sunny place, so as to become as throughly dried as possible, and when so dried, securely placed in a box or basket and conveyed to a warm, dry closet to remain during the winter. If chilled at all during the winter, all hopes of future beauty will be blasted, and the enjoyment derived from a full bloom of spikes of tuberoses should be a sufficient inducement for exercising due diligence in their proper protection.

There is one thing it seems impossible to do—to make sheep do well in a stable in the summer time. They will gain very fast at pasture, with a little grain. In winter they eat better, and with some roots, hay and grain, they will gain rapidly. Instead of selling my surplus sheep at a low price, I am going to feed them. I do not much expect to get any profit on the food, only enough to pay for it. The advantage will be in the fine lot of manure to be made from such food, this will pay for all of the trouble and the grain goes into the home market. This idea of a home market in their own homes, is just what never enters the heads of most farmers. How much more wisdom there would be in the plan to look around and get some animals to fatten, and so keep the grain at home, than to take it away to market, and there compete with our farmers, who can raise it at so much better advantage.

A gentleman who had bred Malay fowl for thirty years, and won more prizes with these fowls than any other fancier in England, says that breeding in-and-in does not necessarily cause deterioration, but all depends how this thing is managed. My plan is to keep about five or six runs, and to rear 200 chickens each year, and to select the best birds from each run for crossing. I thus secure sufficient crossing to prevent deterioration. Many animals are gregarious and the males must frequently pair with their own daughters, for they expel the young males as well as all intruders.

Does Death Sting?

One is remarkably exempt from the crime of hasty induction if he affirm that there is no sane or healthy mortal who anticipates his extinction with any degree of pleasure. The function of dying is absolutely vegetative—we fall to pieces like a flower. This very fact, that the process is chemical, confirms us in the conclusion that the final "throe" is as painless as the inconvenience is nothing to the fœtal pilgrim when he touches on daylight. A moment's examination of the way we are to die will show marks of goodness in our "taking off." The degree of sensitility is proportioned to the integrity of the tissues. An inflammation heightens it; age depreciates it. Any defect in nutrition disturbs the comfort of the individual until the carbonic acid generated in the devitalization of the blood becomes fixed in the cells or is no longer displaced. The sensory ganglia everywhere cease to conduct currents. During the progress of this dissolution of nerve force, this creeping on of this numbness of death, the individual is rapidly passing into a condition of repose, and instead of torture or pangs, a degree of self-satisfaction oft approaching to enthusiasm is realized. The sensations peculiar to the operation of opium, hashish, ether, etc., are not improbably akin to the mental activities of the dying. Barring the hallucinations in the stupor as it gains on the subject, the moribund is familiar with naught that borders on suffering. In short the notion of pain is forbidden the instant that any stimulant fails to excite a response.

Fortunately, for a wholesome study of one's demise, there are assurances abundant, from vivisection, the testimony of those who have been restored to consciousness, affirmations of the dying, that there is no physical recoil from death. Burney tried hard to resist the efforts made to resuscitate him from drowning. so bewitched was he by his prolonged slumber. Dr. Solander, the traveller, was so delighted with the sensations of excessive cold, that he was the first to lie down in the snow to realize the luxury of such a death. Wm. Hunter was sorry he was not able to "write how easy and delightful it is to die." Infants die as serenely as they breathe, and not a few among the advanced in years treat death as a friend to their infirmities. Hanging is naturally rated a most distressing procedure. But it is reported of those who have been saved from strangulation, that the agony promises to be brief, and was rapidly replaced by hallucinations of a fascinating variety.

One would fain believe that the kind God who suffered us to feel no sigh in coming would take no delight in turning our farewell into writhing—nay, He does not quit us at the last. He is our greatest benefactor in allowing us to sleep out of weariness. Death is, assuredly, no tax collector; its "jaws" are not the clutches of an assailant; there is no "victory to the grave;" the ghost speeds away from us as it entered, with no ruffle. The sense of death, as Shakspeare has it, is most in apprehension. It is the fear of the lonely night, not the throes of nature, that makes the leaving painful.

Extravagence in Speech.

Of all the extravagant habits, which bring trouble to one's neighbors, as well as one's self, is that of extravagant speaking. How many a reputation has been injured, nay, lost—how many a home blasted—how many a business credit impaired, by an extravagant mode of speech—a remark with a grain of truth as a basis, embellished and colored so as to grow to such extravagant proportions, the harm is done forthwith. Extravagant professions of love, or friendship, are never to be relied on. Their very form wears out the feeling—it will not last long. Extravagance in religion leads to bigotry—in politics to demagogism. In the press, under its influence freedom becomes license, and so it goes. Let us recommend to those of our readers afflicted with the vice—in a greater or less degree who is not?—to remem what the immortal Shakspeare said to "Romeo": "Love moderately;" and bear in mind that moderation will insure tranquility of mind and a peaceful domestic circle.

A FLORIDA MYSTERY.

The Ghost of the Everglades and the Legend of Bowlder Pool.

A few weeks since there arrived in an eastern city from St. Augustine, Fla., a gentleman who had been travelling in the interior of that state, despite the hot weather; on important business, which led him in the vicinity of that well-known section the "Everglades." Fortunately for the gentleman in question, he remembered that an old friend had bought land near the route he was taking, and had there planted an orange grove, and it occurred to him that here was an opportunity for enjoying Florida hospitality, which had hitherto only reached him through the familiar means of hotels.

His friend's orange grove covered about one-half of a five hundred-acre plantation called "Millamount," and after he got within the boundaries of the sparsely settled region where it was he had no difficulty in finding it. Indeed, it was a very old place, though only within the last ten years planted in oranges. From the last town he had taken horses for himself and servant, and the dozen miles or so which lay between were rapidly ridden over in the late afternoon. Mr. Canaday, the gentleman in question, and who now tells the story, reached "Millamont" just before dusk, and after riding through a long, shady avenue, reined up his horse in front of a broad, two story dwelling, evidently an old-timer, while his friend, Mr. Romayne, came down from a group of persons with whom he was conversing on the piazza to greet and welcome him. Introductions followed, and then it became evident to the guest that something more than common was disturbing the minds of his host and family, about whom there was a curious air of mingled mystery and expectation which soon set his curiosity on the qui vive.

Mr. Romayne either perceived this fact or was himself so full of his subject that he could not keep it secret, for he observed, as they were enjoying their wine after dinner; "You came in good time to witness a sensation, Canaday."

"I had the impression from your manner there was something stirring. What is it?"

"Well, in brief, it is a ghost story. Several of us are going down into the Everglades to inspect for ourselves certain mysterious phenomena of a supernatural character which are said to make their appearance every ten years at this time."

"You surprise me. Have you any idea of the origin of the story?"

"Yes; I know the story and will tell it later on. The occurrences happened about thirty years ago, and every ten years, on the 11th of August, which is to-night, they say that startling scenes occur near a deep, black pool, where we shall go presently."

The party, as made up, consisted of three or four of Mr. Romayne's neighbors himself and Mr. Cannaday, and at about ten o'clock the same night they started from the house, guided by an old negro, who, Mr. Romayne said, had lived with Mr. Millamont when the scene had occurred which it is supposed has given rise to the ghostly appearance.

Taking lanterns, the parties moved in single file through the plantation, and, guided by the negro, struck into a path, which, after an hour's careful picking of steps over hummocks, among vines and underbrush through the swamps of the Everglades, brought them to the side of "Bowlder pool," as it was called, from an immense mass of rock which stood on its margin. The pool was about half an acre in extent, difficult of appoach, and, Mr. Romayne said, very deep and muddy. Beside the bowlder was a dry spot, large enough for a party to huddle together upon it; and there, having first extinguished their lanterns, they seated themselves in various cramped positions and waited silently. Through the dense masses of foliage above their heads the stars could be seen shining, reflected in the black waters of the pool. Occasionally the creak of a frog or the sharp cry of some aquatic bird could be heard, and save that, it was still, damp. and generally a lugubrious situation. It was about midnight when the silence was suddenly broken by a shriek, so awful as to fairly curdle the blood. It was repeated in a moment, and then there was a rush through tangled forest as though of someone escaping from pursuit. It drew nearer and nearer. and presently stifled cries and the panting of a person in hot flight was heard distinctly. The gentlemen had risen to their feet, and, standing with their backs against the huge bowlder, peered into the direction whence the sound proceeded. Nearer still, and now the deep bay of a bloodhound pierced the night, and again that awful shriek—plainly that of a woman, startled their ears and froze the blood in their veins.

The noise of crashing through the underbrush, the heavy breathing of at least two persons, and the low, savage barking of the dog were now so near—in sound—that the watchers gazed in momentary expectation of the appearance of the fugitives. And this is what happened: six credible witnesses aver that suddenly a sheet of light, coming from no one could tell whence, illuminated the scene, and there burst from the forest the figure of a young man, half dragging, half supporting a girl clad in white, her hair disheveled, her clothes torn by the brambles, and who even as she appeared, sent forth again that terrible shriek! They passed within a few rods of the stunned and bewildered group of spectators, and in a moment were followed by a bloodhound, panting and growling, and, behind him, by a large, powerful man, who carried in one hand a heavy whip. The bright light vanished—to reappear above their heads,—and as Mr. Romayne, pointing upward, directed the attention of the others to the top of the rock against which they had been leaning, they saw the young man standing upon it, with the girl clasped in his arms. Meanwhile the dog bayed fiercely below, and then the man who had been following them reached the summit. The whole situation was plainly visible. Springing upon the two, who stood locked in each other's arms, the elder man tore them apart, the girl falling at his feet. Then there was a fierce struggle, and in a moment the stronger man seized the other around the waist, and, with gigantic strength, hurled him into the pool. They heard the splash, saw the water close over his form with a sluggish ripple—and then something white flashed through the air, there was a last bubbling cry—and instantly darkness came again, and there was neither dog nor man, nor anything but the black pool, as still as ever, the dense forest, and the great bowlder.

With one accord the parties lighted their lanterns and hurried from the spot. Arrived at the homestead, Mr. Romayne called for spirits and food, and, indeed, all seemed in need of them—a more pallid, scared party never returned from anywhere. "There is no story to tell," replied Mr. Romayne to a question from his friend. "You have witnessed it all—exactly as I have had it described to me over and over again. The old man was Mr. Millamont, who owned this place and built the house; the girl was his daughter, the young man the son of a neighboring planter, who was her lover. Her father forbade his visits, and, finding them together, chased them with his dog, and when they climbed upon the rock to get away from the bloodhound followed them, and in his rage threw the young man into the pool. Then she plunged after him and both were drowned. Mr. Millamont left the country before he could be arrested, and was reported to have been drowned at St. Augustine two weeks after. His place remained without a tenant until I bought it."

The next morning Mr. Cannaday left for St. Augustine, and now the story in various forms is being circulated through the south. This is his version of it, as an eye and ear witness. And he believes his eyes and ears.—[New York Telegram.

MODERN HAWKSHAWS.

The Requisites for a Successful Career as a Detective—Coolness, Bravery, and Good Judgment—The Real and the Dime-Novel Detective.

"Looking back over my twenty years' experience I can not say that I regret my choice of a profession," remarked a detective at one of the city agencies yesterday.

"What are the requisites of a good detective?" asked a reporter who had been listening to his stories,

"Fearlessness, coolness and self-control. Without these a man can never be a perfect detective, for though he may be useful in some branches of the business he can never attain to the highest eminence in all of them. He must also have strong perceptive faculties, and that power of generalization which will enable him to jump at once to correct conclusions. Memory is one of his most important essentials. One sight of a face must imprint it so indelibly upon his recollection that he can never forget it; and he must remember not only the face itself, but the time, place, and circumstances with which it is associated. A memory of faces alone is not sufficient. The detective must have a strong memory for names, numbers, and dates as well. He must be intelligent, and there is no knowledge of any kind that may not some time be of value to him in his profession. His eyesight and hearing should be of the best, and he should cultivate a power of observation which will enable him to carefully note, without seeming to do so, everything by which he is surrounded.

"Detectives in real life are very different from those in novels and plays. The latter are represented as wearing various disguises such as wigs, false whiskers, etc., which they suddenly pull off at the most unexpected moments, thereby revealing their identity. Dion Boucicault, in one of his plays, represents a detective who is quite a young man as making himself up for an elderly gentleman of more than 60 and going about in broad daylight, holding conversations with people who knew him well in propria persona without discovery. Charles Reade and Wilkie Collins do the same thing in some of their novels. This is simply nonsense. It is utterly impossible for the most skilful hair-worker to make up a wig or a set of false whiskers that can not be detected as false when worn, and every theatre-goer knows that the most skilful artists in 'make-up' can not put upon their faces the lines and wrinkles which indicate age in such a way as to deceive, even when aided by the glamour of the footlights. No detective in real life ever attempted to wear any such disguise. Detectives on the stage are usually debonair individuals in neat suits and mutton-chop whiskers. In real life there is nothing distinctive in the appearance and manner of detectives any more than there is in those of lawyers or merchants. For my own part, I am more frequently taken for a 'well-to-do' farmer than anything else."

"What is the salary of detectives?"

"That is a hard question to answer. There is no business in which the price varies more. Sometimes a man, after having had a little apprenticeship on the police force or in connection with some agency, will set up in business as a private detective, and then he charges whatever he pleases. Detectives are paid by the day, and I have known some of these private detectives, such as I have mentioned, to charge the unsophisticated $25 and even more per day.

"For the services of any of their detectives the Pinkerton agency charges $8 per day, of which about one half goes to the detective himself. This is the invariable charge, and none of the Pinkerton detectives are permitted to work upon any other basis or with a view to obtaining a contingent reward. This is the only right way, for detectives, like merchants, should have one price only, but most of the private detectives can be induced to take up cases on speculation—that is, to agree to demand nothing for their work unless successful, in which event they are to receive a stipulated sum."

"How do men become detectives?"

"They don't 'become;' they have a natural gift in that direction. Detectives, like poets, are born, not made. Many of them begin as amateurs. For instance, something occurs in their own lives which causes them to turn detective for their own purposes They work up the case successfully; they find they like the work, and they embark in it as a business. You know that is the way Allan Pinkerton began. He lived in the far west, and having horses stolen from him on several occasions he traced out the thieves in every instance, brought them to justice, and recovered his property.

"You would be surprised to find how clever some amateur detectives are. I know a young Chestnut street merchant who would make one of the greatest of all detectives if he would follow the business. He wanted to find out the whereabouts and antecedents of a young fellow whom he suspected in a certain manner. He employed detectives, but they could discover nothing. Finally he began to look into the matter himself, and although the man he was after had left the city and covered up his tracks, I'm blest if he didn't find out everything there was to find. He discovered the address of a girl on Race street to whom the man had been paying attentions.

"He called on her, represented himself as lawyer, said that her lover would inherit a fortune if his identity could be established, and in order to do that he'd have to have some specimens of his handwriting, and persuaded her to let him have two of the love letters the fellow had written her. That was as neat a piece of detective-work as I ever heard of.

"It often happens that a man fails to be a good general detective through the lack of some one quality. Thus, I employed a young fellow once who I thought would make a splendid detective. He had everything in his favor, possessing a splendid physique and appearance, an elegant and insinuating address, great shrewdness, remarkable quickness of perception, and, in short, every requisite of a great detective except one, as I afterward discovered. He was lacking in self-control, having an ungoverned temper, to which he gave way on slight provocation. This great fault was not apparent at first, however, and I assigned him to a number of difficult cases, which he worked up very satisfactorily. At last I resolved to test his skill to the utmost, and set him to try and extort a confession from a young woman charged with infanticide. Now, in the course of his interview with this girl, as he afterward confessed to me, he fell in love with her, and took it into his head that she was not only innocent of the crime alleged against her, but that she was not the real mother of the infant which she was accused of having destroyed, but that she had merely assumed the responsibility of being its mother to shield a friend. However, resolved to do his duty, and feeling sure the result would be such earnest protestations of innocence as would convince the whole world of their sincerity, he persevered in his attempts to extort a confession. He acted with so much tact that she broke down completely, and was about to confess the whole affair, but being satisfied, from her words and actions, that she was undoubtedly guilty, he became so enraged to find that one whom he had allowed himself to love and believe in had been guilty of such baseness that he burst forth into such a torrent of oaths and invectives against her as to seal her lips forever on the subject of her crime. The result was her prompt acquittal for lack of direct evidence. Thus you see how important it is for a detective to keep his temper."

"Are not the innocent often mistaken for the guilty?"

"Very often, An innocent man wrongly accused will always appear like a guilty one while a hardened criminal, under the most criminating circumstances, will seem the personification of virtuous innocence. I remember a singular circumstance that occurred at the Smithsonian institution in Washington, when I was doing special duty there some years ago. In one of the coin cases there was a rare old Roman coin, supposed to be the only one of the kind in existence. One day a gentleman came with a written order from a high official directing a curator to let him take the coin out of the case to examine it. It was placed in his hand, and after looking at it to his heart's content he returned it, as he thought, to its place in the case and turned to leave the room. The curator approaching the case to lock it found that the coin was missing. He stated the fact to the gentleman, who immediately became very red and indignant and declared positively that he had replaced it, at the same time trying to leave the room. I intercepted him and being convinced from his conduct that that he had stolen the coin, insisted upon searching him. He positively refused to permit this, whereupon the curator and myself after a hard struggle, succeeded in searching him by force, and found the coin in one of his pockets. I was just going to conduct him to durance vile when the curator, who had gone to restore the coin, stopped me, returned it to the gentleman with apologies The poor man had mislaid the original coin in the case and had previously purchased at great expense a similar one, which we had found in his pocket, and his visit was for the purpose of comparing the two."—[Philadelphia Times.

The Fascination of Ballooning.

Explorers of the air and earth are strangely alike in two respects—individually they seldom weary of their self-imposed struggles and collectively they make little progress. A first plunge into Africa or the Arctic is almost certainly followed by a return trip, if the first be survived, Yet a lady's finger-tip can cover all of the polar circle yet charted. and Africa is still the unknown continent. Five hundred ascents are credited to Prof. Wise, and Godard left the clouds beneath him at least 890 times. Their perseverance can hardly be surpassed and modern skill and science were exhausted in their appliances. Yet they went little higher or further or longer than the bold men who tested Montgolfier's discovery a century ago. The fascination of ballooning is akin to that of gambling. There is a glorious uncertainty whether the auronaut will come back to be feted and quizzed by men of science, or whether many sorts of unpleasant things will happen to him.

MORSELS FOR SUNDAY CONTEMPLATION.

The heart often leads to the sheerest folly.

After all, how often our reason fails us at a pinch.

With men, friendships mean something, and last.

In the saddest life there is always some compensation.

Meddling rarely accomplishes anything except mischief.

There are hidden laws that control and shape our lives.

Women learn more through their hearts than their heads.

The instinctive craving of every nature is for that which supplements itself.

One cannot live and fight side by side with a man for years and not know his mettle.

How true it is that often the heaviest burdens of life are those at which the world would laugh, and of which the overweighted heart cannot and will not speak.

When the Shah, during his visit to England, passed the St. Thomas Hospital, his amazement was great on finding what he supposed a palace to be a refuge for the sick and poor.

MARKDALE OCT. 23, 1884.

A SAD ACCIDENT.

A Lad 13 years old has both legs torn off by a Threshing Machine.

HE EXPIRES IN 13 HOURS.

A most heartrending accident occurred on the farm of Mr. Geo. Hill, 11th line, Euphrasia, about 9 o'clock on Tuesday last, where Stinson Bros. were threshing, in which one of the brothers, met with a most sickening and fatal accident. The younger brother, Thomas J., was attending ordinary duties oiling, &c., when the coupling near the gearing caught his clothes, instantly winding him up and literally tearing both legs off below the knees before the machine could be stopped. One of the feet had passed through the cylinder and the other was found near the place where the accident occurred. Dr. Sproule was immediately sent for and on arriving found that little or no hopes could be entertained for his recovery, both legs being completely severed below the knees, and several wounds about the head and other parts of the body. He, however, bound up the battered and bleading form, but the unfortunate sufferer continued to sink until 10 o'clock in the evening when death ended his sufferings. It is a sad stroke of affliction for his parents and the family, who live in the same neighborhood where the sad event happened. The funeral will take place to-day, (Thursday) to the Presbyterian cemetary, leaving the house at 10 a. m.

AGAIN SUCCESSFUL.

We are pleased to observe that our enterprising townsman, Mr. J. R. Trimble, has again been successful in taking a first prize and diploma at the great Northern Fair held at Walkerton last week, with his celebrated entire horse, Clear Grit, Jr.; also a first prize with his young Clear Grit mare, which gives promise of great excellence. It is the natural outcome of the true spirit of humanity to feel a degree of pride in all that pertains to ourselves, whether of a national or local character; hence we admire the public spirit and enterprise which actuates Mr. Trimble in placing within the reach of our farmers, a horse which has no compeer in the province, as a roadster—a class of horse which will always find a ready market. On former occasions we have admonished our readers to devote a greater share of their energies to stock raising, of all kinds, our country is peculiarly well adapted therefor, not only for its excellent pasturage, but its abundant supply of pure spring water.

Meaford Road.

Mr. Robert Shannon, Jr., is here visiting among his friends and former acquaintances.

Mr. Daniel Walker has rented Mrs. Foley's farm. He thinks that it will pay him better than working at chance jobs.

Mr. Jesse Wing has purchased a farm in Euphrasia and has gone there to live.

The present teacher of the day school here, Mr. Robert McLaughry, has been re-engaged for 1885.

Eldon, son of Mr. J. Brodie, had his arm broken last week by being thrown from a milk waggon. Dr. Sproule fixed up the broken sores, and he is now doing well.

Mr. T. Penelton was compelled to leave the farm on which he was living, in the village, by the lawsuit in which he was engaged going against him.

Dundalk.

From our own Correspondent.

The Band racket is subsiding, the leading members being ashamed of their childishness and the younger members disclaiming all connection with the affair. We hope our band boys will hold together, and continue to blow and prosper.

Dr. McWilliam's residence is being proceeded with, and when completed will be an ornament to the village.

The brick work on Mr. Clarks block is finished, and presents a very neat appearance.

Mr. J. Duncan, one of the Plymouth brethren of Toronto, has been holding forth here of late.

Revs. Snowdon and Shaw have commenced a series of special services in the Methodist Church here.

On Saturday evening the alarm of fire! was raised. The roof of a house, owned by Mr. Wm. Robinson, and occupied by Mr. A. Duncan, caught fire. The fire-bell hastily summoned the villagers, and the fire was extinguished, but not till the roof was considerably damaged, and the contents injured by hasty removal. The fire-bell is a very useful article in our town. A few gongs collect a large crowd in a few moments.

Our village is increasing in wealth, another "precious jewell" having been added last week.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

Miss Miller of Owen Sound, is at present visiting at J. W. Armstrong's, Esq.,

J. R. Clark, Esq., of Hamilton Times, after passing through an attack of typhoid fever, has quite recovered again and with his wife has been spending a few days at his father-in-law's, J. W. Armstrong's. Mr. Clark left here on Monday last and we understand will sail from New York on Thursday for England where he intends spending a few months. We wish him a safe and speedy trip across the Big water.

The Rev. Alfred Andrews, who has been appointed by the Guelph conferance of the Methodist Church to do special Sabbath School work, preached in the Methodist Church here on Sunday evening last to a large audience and on the Monday evening following lectured in the basement of the same Church to a crowded house. Mr. Andrews' lecture was lengthy, full of life, and interesting, and we think will do much good in creating a deeper interest in Sabbath School work.

Mrs. Ed. Higginbotham, of Bowmanville daughter of Rev. D. C. McDowell, who, some time ago, received some injuries from jumping out of a buggy, is now convalescent and paying a visit at home here at present.

Wednesday afternoon Oct. 15th the residence of W. J. Armstrong, Esq., was the scene of a cheerful and happy gathering of friends, being occasioned by the the marriage of his second daughter, Lydia to Thos. Aikinhead of Toronto, the ceremony was performed by the Rev. D. C. McDowell, at the hour of two o'clock, after which the company partook of a bountiful repast, then the happy couple was escorted to the Flesherton depot when they took the evening train for Toronto, from theoce, on their wedding tour.

A very unpleasant scene occurred in our village on Monday last, between two men R. Hardgreave and Mr. Nelson sr. It appears Hardgreave and some others had been drinking in the Hotel, when Nelson was asked to drink with them but refused to do so Mr. Nelson left the hotel but was followed by Hardgreave, to Mr. Trimblee store when he, Hardgreave, charged Nelson with owing him some money and struck Mr. Nelson, making violent threats, when Mr. N. who had been cutting an apple had his knife in his hand struck at Hardgreave, and inflicted a severe cut in his upper lip. A charge was laid by Hardgreave with J. W. Armstrong, J. P., but was afterward withdrawn.

Walters Falls.

Since you received my last note the new flour mill here has changed hands. Messrs. Olmstead & Clark have retired and Mr. Charles Freeman has assumed sole control. Mr. Freeman has resided for many years in Meaford, where he once conducted the steam flour mill, I believe, to the satisfaction of every one, and from his well known business capacity and energy, there can be little doubt that he will prove the right man in the right place.

I have to chronicle the advent of another son of St. Crispin, from Thornbury, a family man, who has started in business for himself. A new doctor has lately arrived from Halton Co. We have now two ministers, two doctors, and if we only had a couple of lawyers, would be ready for any emergency. So the folk keep pouring in. Well, let them come; there is room enough as yet for all that come—of that kind. I say of that kind, as I am not in favor of indiscrimmate immigration. We want the honest, sober, and industrious; not the idle and dissolute, to hang around street corners, showing a bad example to the rest of the community.

Dear Sir,—'Tis but trite to observe—

"That the mélancholy days have come—
The saddest of the year."

"The sere and yellow leaves" lie strewn around us or yet flutter mournfully on the boughs. What a beautiful simile it is, which I have seen somewhere, that nature dresses up in her most brilliant, gay, and gaudy robes, just before death, or the semblance of death, which our long and severe winter presents, as if to note her departure and to bid us a bright farewell.

Life has been aptly compared to the seasons, (Spring)—

"Oh, life how pleasant in thy morning;
Young fancy's rays the hills adorning;"

that enchanted time,—

"When the feelings were young,
And the world was new,
Like the fresh bowers of Paradise
Opening to view."

Then the summer of our days, when in the full strength and vigor of maturity, we enter with eagerness and zest, on our various pursuits of business or pleasure. Then Autumn follows. We feel we are declining and look back with soberness on our past career. We have the fruition of our exertions and aspirations, or perhaps the saddened retrospect of bereavements, failures, or disappointments.

A paring bee was held at Mr. T. Campbell's on Friday evening last. Most of the elite of the place, and a goodly number of commoners besides had been invited. After a bountiful supper abundant in delicacies, amongst which roast duck figured conspicuously; jokes and merry chat went round; but the prime moving spirit of the evening's hilarity was Mr. T. Home, Master Tailor here, whose fund of jests, anecdotes, repartee, and bon mots, seemed inexhaustible and kept the table in a perpetual roar. That gentleman has the happy knack of making old witticisms and stories appear as good if not better than new ones, by the imitable drollery of his expression and recital. One about the Cannibal and the Missionary fairly brought down the house. Said the Cannibal to the Missionary, "I think I'll eat you." "I don't agree with you my friend," says the Missionary. "Do you think so," returned the Cannibal. "Oh, then I'll let you go as I do not like to take anything that does'nt agree with me." The party broke up at a late hour, all seeming to have thoroughly enjoyed themselves and all unanimous in their praises of the kind and liberal hostess, Mrs. T. Campbell.

I find the average weight of new wheat to be 60 lbs. to the bushel, and the most of it, if properly cleaned, would weigh 61 or 62 to the bushel.

Attention.—We are in need of funds, and about half of our subscribers are in arrears for 1884: now this is not using us fair, we have to pay cash for all our material, cash for wages and a cash outlay of $100 a year for postage and express. We call upon every one who is indebted to us either for subscription or other account to come forward with the needful at once; don't wait for a personal call but remit the amount or hand it in.

Highly pleased.—I have had this summer a dwelling house erected and completed, and wish to express my entire satisfaction for the manner in which the contractor, Mr. Thos. Abbott, did his work throughout; he having done a first class job and proved himself honorable in his dealings as well as competent in his work. I also wish to thank Mr. Henry Gill, painter, for the very satisfactory manner in which he did the painting. Wm. Deaver, Holland.

A Valuable Nest.—Mrs. Madill, who resides near Dunedin has worked very hard in her lifetime, and by honest effort had accumulated about $600 from the sale of butter, poultry etc. The odd lady did not believe in banks nor in any of the various methods provided for the investment of money, so she stowed her pile carefully away in a spot known only to herself. Wishing to add to it she paid the hidden place a visit last week, but found that her wealth had melted away like the Simcoe hotel men before the Scott Act vote, and only fragments of paper were left to show that the mice had destroyed the whole of the money, to build themselves a $600 nest. Mr. Wm. Hanbury now holds forth at the "Belfast House" and is prepared to wait on the public with choice groceries and A 1 liquors. Give him a call.

Our respected townsman Mr. R. B. Currie took his departure a few days ago for Elora, and will return with his bride to-day. We welcome them to our village, and wish them true happiness and prosperity.

Remember the S. S, Anniversary in the Methodist Church next Tuesday evening. Sabbath Schools richly deserve a liberal support, and great pains have been taken to make this entertainment highly interesting.

Mr. John Foster has purchased the saw mill at Corbetton, four miles south of Dundalk on the Railway from Mr. Shook. Mr. Foster has called a sale of his farm stock implements &c., and will remove to Corbetton in November. The sale will take place next Wednesday.

WEATHER PROBABILITIES.

Fortelling the weather is a useful science, but relieving the effects of its sudden changes is a better one. Hayyard's Pectoral Balsam cures coughs and colds, incident to sudden changes.

Pair'd.—Our esteemed young folk, Edward S. Rutledge and Miss Anna J. Thibaudeau, having decided that—

"Two is better far than one, have been united in holy bonds, for better or for worse. We wish them a happy and prosperous journey through life.

A Fighting Editor.—On Saturday last, a person dressed in female apparel struck our village, and proceeded to make a personal canvass for subscribers to a sporting paper in Toronto and claiming to be, herself, editor of the same. During the canvass, however, a dispute arose between her and a worthy citizen, and the plucky female editor repaired to a harness establishment, purchased a whip and proceeded to chastise the above citizen. He had her promptly arrested, but soon after she was liberated; then it was that the question was hinted around: is she a female: she uses the whip like a man: she walks like a male, &c.. &c.; but later, the disputed question as to her sex was settled by a young man affirming that she was a female, he having found out.

W. H. BROWN.
Markdale, Sept. [illegible] 1884.

THE TRUTH OF IT.

I, and I alone of all living men, know the truth of it; and although in these pages I ightly alter the details, and change the mes of the actors in that sad tragedy, my ration of the facts will be sufficiently accurate to enable anyone who was interested in the case to know to what I refer.

On the morning of—say, the 20th of February, 1870, I reached my office at the usual hour, half past nine o'clock; and having perused my letters, summoned my confidential clerk, Mr. Wilson.

"Are Mr. Northwick's papers ready?" I asked, as he entered my room.

"Quite ready," replied Mr. Wilson; who guessing what I wanted, had brought the documents with him.

He placed them in due order before me; and after glancing through them, and satisfying myself as to the manner in which they had been prepared, I sat awaiting the appearance of the gentleman for whose signature the papers were ready.

Roland Northwick was not only a good client, but a dear friend of mine. His father before him had borne the same relation to me. As my age lay about midway between the two generations, it had been [my fortune to be able to stand on equal terms of friendship with both father and son; so that upon the death of the former, the management of all the legal business connected with the estate continued in my hands as before.

The particular business which now engaged me on Roland's behalf was a very pleasant task to me. He was to be married in a few days, and the match was in every way suitable and desirable one. Miss Musgrave, the lady of his choice, was well born, well dowered, and moreover, a beautiful and amiable girl. Everything was going well and smoothly—no hitches in the settlements, no unpleasantness with friends on either side. In all human probability the union would bring happiness to the contracting parties.

I was very fond of Roland; but having known him from a boy, did not hesitate to lecture him on certain things connected with his batchelor life which had, from time to time, come to my knowledge. Yet many of these were only the faults common to young men, and I felt convinced that marriage, and marriage with a girl he really loved, would lead him so far away from the errors of youth that there would be little chance of his returning to them. In truth, I had so high an opinion of the young man, that I would not have hesitated to entrust my own daughter's happiness to his keeping.

He possessed a large property, and as there were several things connected with his estate which I wished settled before his marriage and departure on the long tour he purposed making with his bride, I was very busy with his affairs. This morning he had promised to call at my office, about ten o'clock, to sign several documents. Later on, I knew he intended to leave town; so as the papers were of importance, I felt much annoyed when half-past ten came and he had not yet made his appearance.

I looked over the papers once more, then said to my clerk:

"Perhaps Mr. Northwick misunderstood me and thinks I am coming to him. I will take a cab and go to Jermyn street. If he should call, ask him to wait till I return."

Roland Northwick lived in chambers in Jermyn Street. His town house had been let furnished since his father's death. Now, I was glad to think, the bachelor's chambers would be given up, and the house occupied by its owner and his young wife as soon as they sought fit to return from their Continental tour.

In a few minutes I alighted at No.—, Jermyn Street. Even as my hand was on the bell, the door was suddenly thrown open, and some one rushing out nearly threw me down. It was Roland's groom, a respectable man, whom I know well by sight. His face was blanched with terror, his looks were wild. He seemed to recognize me, and gasped, "Oh God! My master! Upstairs!" Then shouting, "Police! Police!" he rushed madly down the street

I ran upstairs to Roland's rooms. Outside the bedroom door crouched a terrified servant maid, with horror in her eyes. Inside, on the bed, lay Roland Northwick, apparently fast asleep, but in a sleep that would never be broken; for a felon hand had driven a knife deep into his heart.

It was a sight I have never forgotten—a sight I never shall forget. Even after all these years it comes to me in my dreams. Had the murdered man been a total stranger to me, that sight would have haunted me; but as one of my dearest friends lay there, what wonder if the shock almost deprived me of my senses? I was unable at the time to realize the extent of the calamity, and stood gazing at the frightful sight as motionless and almost as powerless as the form stretched in front of me. Then came the rush of feet, and the room filled with people. Policemen hustled me from the bedside, and I heard the words, "Make room for the doctor!" I saw a gentleman bend over and examine the corpse; then he shook his head, and I knew that every lingering hope must be dispelled, and that Roland Northwick lay dead before me. Murdered as he slept—but by whom?

As I stood by the dressing table, resting my hand upon it for support, I placed it accidentally upon a morsel of paper. Why, I knew not; but my fingers closed on it, and mechanically, I read a few words written there. I am sure at the time I was quite unable to grasp the meaning, but the idea must have come to me somehow that the substance of that letter, or whatever it was, ought not to be exposed to every curious eye. This must have been the reason why I folded the paper and placed it in my pocket.

Shortly after the room was cleared, and the necessary steps taken to sift the dreadful mystery.

The inquest opened the next day, and, after some formal evidence, was adjourned. The doctor deposed that Roland had been killed by a stab with a knife, the point of which had penetrated his heart, so that death must have been instantaneous. The groom stated, that according to custom, he had called in Jermyn Street for his master's orders at nine o'clock in the morning. He was informed that Mr. Northwick had not yet risen. He had then waited an hour, and, as his master did not make his appearance, had rapped at the bedroom door without getting any response. At half-past ten he knocked again without success. Shortly afterward, fearing his master, who was generally an early riser, must be ill, he had ventured to open the door, and so made the ghastly discovery. I stated the little I knew about it, and the inquest was then adjourned for several days. I should mention that, in the doctor's opinion, the murder must have been committed between eight and nine o'clock in the morning.

At the adjourned inquest fresh evidence came forward. Roland's watch and chain were found to be missing. This seemed to show clearly that robbery had been the object of the crime. The knife was produced. It was no assassin's dagger, or weapon a robber would be likely to choose. It was simply a short bladed, white handled carving knife, such as are designed to carve poultry or game. Use had worn it to a sharp point, and a strong hand had found it an easy task to drive it up to the very handle in poor Roland's breast. It afforded no clew whatever likely to lead to the detection of the wretch who had wielded it. The maker's name had long been worn away and there must have been millions of similar knives in existence.

The servant at the chambers next gave evidence. At first she roundly stated that by no possibility could anyone have entered the house that morning without her knowledge; but, under pressure, admitted that whilst cleaning the doorsteps, between eight and nine o'clock, she had crossed the road to say a few words to another servant, leaving the door wide open during her absence. How long had she been away? At first she only confessed to a minute, but a series of judicious questions proved her to have been absent from a quarter to half an hour. She was sure no one entered the house, although she admitted that she had gone into the opposite house to inspect some new article of finery which her friend had purchased.

This was sufficient. The murderer had waited his time, entered the open and deserted door, probably intent upon robbery, then, having struck the fatal blow, and walked away, unnoticed and unsuspected. It was all clear. The jury returned a verdict of 'Wilful murder by some person or persons unknown." Government offered the usual reward of a hundred pounds, the heirs of the dead man increased this to five hundred pounds, and Scotland Yard was all agog.

I need not enlarge upon the terrible time I had during those days. The anguish of Miss Musgrave, who insisted upon seeing me and hearing all the harrowing details from my lips. The genuine sorrow I myself felt at the loss of my friend. The utter sadness and dreariness of the funeral, which took the place of the anticipated gay wedding. The inquiries of well meaning but inquisitive friends. The dreadful sight that was ever before my eyes. All these combined to render me almost unfit for business. Indeed, what I should have done, without the assistance of my confidential clerk, Mr. Wilson, I cannot tell. He rendered me yeoman's service at that time, and resolved to repay him when an opportunity presented itself.

James Wilson was a man of about thirty-six; gentlemanly, sedate, and trustworthy. He had now been with me some three years, and I placed every confidence in him, and respected his great ability. Originally he had practised on his own account, as a solicitor—somewhere in the West of England, I believe; but being one of those many men who are better off as servants than as masters, he had managed to come to grief over that precipice that yawns before all young solicitors—transactions with speculative builders. After his failure he was strongly recommended to me as fit to fill a responsible post, and I installed him as my principal clerk.

Although a quiet, reticent man, I soon discovered that he was well educated. I knew nothing of him in his private capacity. The few well-meaning advances, in a social way, which I had at first made to him, had been respectfully but decidedly declined, so that when office hours were over he went his own way. I did not even know where he lived. For all I knew it might be in an attic; but as he was the first to reach the office and the last to leave it, it was no concern of mine. He was an admirable clerk; but at first I was distressed by the melancholy look he always wore—a look as though the world had not been kind to him—but after a time I ceased to notice it; or concluded that, in spite of his unhappy looks, my clerk was as comfortable as the majority of people.

The press of a professional business always seems to come when you are least able to cope with it. It was so at the time when the terrible event happened. Leaving every thing connected with Roland Northwick out of the question, I had more work than I could do. Wilson was my right hand, left hand, head and all, at the time. He worked as I believe no clerk ever yet worked, and his pale face told of nights spent in my service. I was afraid the strain would be too great for his rather delicate looking frame; but he assured me his health was good, even if his appearance belied it.

It was well I had with me some one whom I could trust to attend to my work, as, in truth, for some days I could think of little else than Roland Northwick, and wonder, as all the world was wondering, who killed him.

Robbery, said the general public: murdered by a common criminal for the sake of plunder. Robbery, said Scotland Yard, and easily to be traced—the watch and chain will give us the clew. Robbery was Mr. Wilson's opinion when I talked the matter over with him. Robbery, said all poor Roland's friends, save one. I alone knew that robbery had not been the murderer's aim—that if the watch and chain had been taken it was but to throw the hunters on a false scent—that the man who struck that deadly blow, struck it for vengeance, and vengeance only. Not that I knew a man in the world who was Roland Northwick's enemy. Gay, pleasant Roland, with a smile, a kind word, and, when needed, an open purse for everyone. But as I smoothed out that slip of paper, which I had picked up from his dressing table, I found these words:

"My husband knows all. I could not help it. Beware."

The writing was, of course, a woman's; this was, doubtless, why in that dreadful moment my confused brain had led me to conceal the words whose meaning at that time I could not grasp. The first thing that struck me, as I examined the paper when alone, was the peculiar character of the writing. It was, evidently, undisguised, but it appeared as if the writer had striven to acquire a certain sort of originality in the formation of her letters. The long letters, being unusually long, gave an elegant, if rather peculiar, look to the hand writing. The paper was a half sheet of creamlaid note—torn off, perhaps, to prevent any name or address appearing—and I noticed that, good as the writing was, it was rather tremulous in places, as though written by an aged woman, or by one in great haste, or suffering from some powerful emotion. The paper had been twisted into a knot, and then addressed, so there was no envelope for it, and the note, from the outside appearance, must have been delivered by hand.

As I sat with that paper in front of me, I knew for certain that the man who had slain Roland Northwick in his sleep was the husband of the woman who had penned those words of warning. Roland had lived as many another man lives, taking his pleasure where he found it, and counting not the cost. His life, I feared, had been shed to appease the vengeance of an injured husband. He was no libertine; but he was young, and few young men can resist temptation when it assails them in the shape of a fair woman.

I may have been wrong—I was wrong in the course I took, but I was fully resolved that the letter which I alone had seen should not become public property—that it should not serve as a theme for the newspaper to enlarge upon and to point out in unctuous paragraphs what the wages of sin, etc., must be. Poor Roland's murder had rung through England, and the mind of the public had been greatly stirred by it. It was unprecedented that a man should be killed in broad daylight, in the centre of a populous neighborhood, and that the assassin should escape scot free. Already the papers had begun to sneer at the incompetency of the detectives, and to hint that a change in the present system was desirable. Moreover, I was anxious that no word of what I suspected should reach Miss Musgrave's ears; nothing that should lead her to think that aught save robbery had been the murderer's object. So I determined to keep the matter secret until the inquest was over. Then I sent for the detective in charge of the case. I was as eager as anyone that the guilty should be brought to justice, so lost no time in endeavoring to put the police on the right scent.

"Mr. Sharpe," I said, "you are doing all that can be done, I hope."

'Everything, sir; and I hoped to have caught him before this. But, strange to say, we can find no trace of the stolen property. I am afraid it's in the melting-pot."

"Before you go any further," I said, "I want you to disabuse your mind of the idea that the murder was committed for the sake of plunder."

The detective smiled, as much as to say, 'Everyone thinks he knows better than we do."

"If I wanted to earn this large reward," I continued, "I should ascertain all about Mr. Northwick's habits—what acquaintances he had of which his friends knew nothing—any ties he might have formed. In fact, I will be candid with you, Mr. Sharpe—I know that a day or two before he died my poor friend received a letter warning him to beware of some woman's husband. I can tell you no more than this, but it ought to be enough."

"You should have said so before the coroner, sir."

"Yes—and given the guilty man full warning. Now he suspects nothing, and should easily be discovered."

This reasoning of mine was so cogent that Mr. Sharpe was forced to agree with it. I could give him no more information, so he departed, certain of claiming the reward in a week's time. I heard no more for some days, save the usual statement that the police had a clew and were following it.

When I saw the detective again he was quite crestfallen.

"I have made every inquiry," he said, "but I cannot find a word of scandal against Mr. Northwick. I think, sir, that you are making a mistake."

"I am not," I replied. "The blow was struck in revenge, and the man who struck it is probably in London now."

But it was no use. The reward was never claimed, and poor Roland's murder went to swell the already long list of undiscovered and unavenged crimes. After a while a still more appalling tragedy drove it from the public mind, and only those closely interested continued to think of it. I had done all I could, so I locked the mysterious slip of paper in my secretaire, wondering whether fate or chance would some day reveal the writer's name to me. It appeared to me that the whole affair had been terribly mismanaged; as, with such information as I had been able to give Sharpe, suspicion at least, should have fallen on some one. However closely poor Roland might have veiled any indiscretion of his, surely the skill of Scotland Yard should have laid it bare. There must have been meetings—there must have been servants who carried letters or messages—there must have been some persons who could throw light on the affair; and yet not the slightest trace of the intrigue which I suspected could Inspector Sharpe's skill discover. I must confess that, as I placed the paper in a safe drawer, I was inclined to agree with the newspapers that a change was needful in our detective arrangements.

Five years passed by. The grass had grown long on Roland Northwick's grave—his memory had vanished from all but a few hearts. If his name were casually mentioned, men would say: "Ah, yes, Roland Northwick! He committed suicide, or was killed, or something—I forget now what it was." Everybody save myself had given up the hope of seeing his murderer hanged, but I had a conviction that the piece of paper lying in my desk would some day or another bring the guilty man to justice.

The five years had been very uneventful to me. I was growing grayer and richer, and was beginning to look forward to taking life somewhat easier; but when a man is in the swim of a large professional business, he finds great difficulty in reaching the shores of retirement. During these five years I had once more drawn up settlements for Miss Musgrave. Time had healed her wounds, and she had now been married twelve months. I did not blame her for forgetting—if she did forget. With the young, no sorrow can be eternal. She had mourned Roland long and truly, and I was glad that her bright eyes were not destined to be always saddened with the memory of the man she loved best.

My trusted clerk, Mr. James Wilson, was still with me. He was grave, reserved, and correct as ever. Perhaps even more pale, unhappy, and delicate in appearance; but he never complained of his health, and as he worked early and late to my benefit, I could only suppose his constitution was better than it looked. I never saw such a man to work; certainly no man not working for himself. No sooner was one thing finished than another was commenced; and I may safely say that, during those five years, except on business, he had not been absent from his desk an hour. He reminded me of a machine, wound up and sent into the world to work with unerring accuracy until the wheels and the spring at last broke down.

Once or twice I had raised his salary. He had accepted the increase with quiet, but not effusive thanks, as one who knew he fully earned it. As he was now so important to me in my business, and as he knew my clients almost as well as I knew them myself, I had once more gone out of my way to endeavor to creat some sort of friendship in private life between us. I invited him—indeed, pressed him—to come home and spend a Sunday with me at Richmond. He declined in his usual polite way; and upon my telling him my reason for urging it was that I thought men who spent so many hours in business together should not be entire strangers out of the office bounds, he said:

"You must really excuse me, Mr. Maitland. I have visited no one for years. I am never happy in company. Indeed, I dare say by this time you have noticed that I have peculiarities of my own, and I am quite unfitted for society."

I was more annoyed at this rebuke than I cared to say, and resolved that for the future he should go his own way, live his own life, and I would trouble no more about it.

Yet at the time of which I now write—five years after Northwick's murder—I began to realize the fact that I was not quite so young as I was; so, after much consideration, and, perhaps, not altogether heedless of what appeared just, I decided that the hour had come to offer Wilson a partnership. He had now been with me eight years. His conduct and general bearing had been irreproachable. His transactions were all strictly honorable. I felt I should be happier with the business in the hands of a man whom I so thoroughly knew and trusted, than were I to take as a partner one unproved—although the latter course might be more advantageous in a pecuniary sense.

I told Wilson of my good intentions toward himself. His pale face flushed, and, for once, I saw him manifest signs of real feeling—so much so that I began to hope, that, standing on terms of equality, we might be more companionable. Judge of my surprise when he said:

"I am really much obliged to you, Mr. Maitland—deeply grateful for this proof of confidence—but I regret to say I must decline your offer."

"Decline it, Mr. Wilson! You must be mad."

"Perhaps I am—perhaps I am philosophical—I told you I was peculiar. I am, although you won't believe it, a restless man, and I know if I were bound in partnership with you I should want to leave you before three months were over. Now that I can quit you at any time I choose, I stay on, and probably shall continue to do so if you wish to keep me."

The man was an unsatisfactory riddle; but I did not like to see him throwing away his chances in this fashion, so I said:

"But, Wilson, have you no belongings—no family dependent upon you?"

"I have no near relatives," he replied.

"Why don't you get married? You would find life a great deal happier with a nice pleasant wife to look after you."

"I shall never get married—women and I don't agree."

"Then you are quite determined to refuse my offer?"

"Quite, Mr. Maitland. Thanks to your generosity, I have a larger income than I want, and am free from all business anxiety; so I could not be be better off. But will you allow me to shake your hand and thank you, once and for all, for your invariable kindness to me?"

I said no more, but held out my hand. Wilson grasped it, and then returned to his desk and his drafts as though nothing unusual had happend, and he had not deliberately thrown away the chance of a lifetime.

Begging as a Regular Business

In China begging is a regular business, beggars being born into the profession and bringing up their children to it. In every large city there is a vast association of mendicants, to whom every one who begs for a living must belong. At the head is one styled the Beggar King. His authority is absolute; and to him the others are amenable. The society has a code of rules, and by this every beggar has a right, according to custom, to stand at the door of a dwelling and howl, sing, knock, or make any other noise he pleases, until the occupant gives him one cash. Then he is obliged to desist and can apply at the same place no more that day. No two are allowed to beg together at the same place, yet they are so numerous that few doors are free from their clamorings long at a time. The proprietors of large establishments, who desire to save themselves from the annoyance of the continual visitations, do so by paying a certain sum at once to the King, who causes a written statement to that effect to be pasted by the side of the door, and this procures for the house certain exemption. No beggar dare approach it, for, though few of them, can read, all recognise the seal of their chief, and if one transgresses he may be beaten by the occupants of the house, or, being reported to the King, be more severely punished. Every beggar has his beat, beyond which he dare not go, and has also his superior, to whom every night he hands over a certain part of the day's proceeds. The overseers in turn pay to the King a fixed sum monthly, which must be large, as he lives like a nabob. If a beggar breaks the laws he is sent to the King, who is held responsible by the city magistrates for the good conduct of all his people. The punishment he administers is generally too slow for the people who suffer from the depredations of the beggars, and when a beggar is detected in an offense his punishment generally consists in having his hands tied behind him, being drawn up over the limb of the nearest tree and beaten half to death with sticks, clubs, fists or anything that comes to hand.

A Bird Twelve Feet High.

The tallest bird known to ethnologists was found by Prof. Herbert in the lower eocene deposits near Paris, France. It was over twelve feet in height, and could have bitten a man's head off as easily as a woodpecker can nip a cherry. We cannot be too thankful that this bird has gone out of fashion and existence. Ladies would have wanted it to wear on their hats, and men who sat behind such bonnet ornaments in the theatres would be unable to see whether a ballet or a prayer-meeting were in progress on the stage.—[Boston Herald.

ROBBING HORSE-JOCKEYS

The Disgraceful Scene on a French Course—Assessed of "Ropi

A Paris cablegram says: Paris[illegible] formerly had for their [illegible] the government, but now, it would [illegible] their aim is to upset jockeys and [illegible] the dust. [illegible] behavior was now furious, and [illegible] brutal. Crowds of people rushed [illegible] shouting frantically. The Duc de [illegible] ara, which at least could have [illegible] case of offence, was made the [illegible] perfect storm of blows from [illegible] sticks, and even stones. She stumbled [illegible] her jockey Sharpe was unhorsed. [illegible] badly maltreated that he had to be [illegible] his home in a cab. The affair now [illegible] ated into a riot. The crowd endeavored to storm the weighing-room, and one [illegible] who had ventured too far was seized. [illegible] three exasperated jockeys, who struck [illegible] him of his clothes, and were about to [illegible] him when the picket of troops came on the [illegible] scene, and saved him from his impending fate. Your correspondent, who was an eyewitness of the scene, had to-day an opportunity to interview the jockeys and ascertain the real cause of this disgraceful turmoil. At the start, Infidele made play and [illegible] he led until entering the straight, [illegible] this point she died away and let up. Passing the grand stand Georgina was leading. Sharpe, however, made a great effort with Blonde II., and momentarily succeeded in gaining a lead of half a length, but in the last few strides Georgina came on again, finally winning at the post by half a length. Infidele, who had almost stopped before the finish, returned first to weigh. Shouts and hootings greeted her entrance to the passage leading to the weighing-room. The crowd accused her jockey of not having taken it out and of "roping." When Infidele and her jockey had disappeared from public view, it was thought the incident was terminated. Georgina was allowed to pass without any hostile demonstration, but when came to the turn of Blonde II. and her jockey. A fresh clamour broke out, and horse and rider found themselves hemmed in by two ranks of angry and disappointed betters. Sharpe very sensibly did not [illegible] to force his way, but took a [illegible] gallop over the part of the course that remained clear, hoping that this statesmanlike move would give time for the evanescence of a French crowd to evaporate. [illegible] bob, however, continued to shove and [illegible] and he finally entered the weighing-room amid angry cries, and even blows, from those who were ranged on each side of the [illegible] kind of lane leading to it. The crowd even followed him into the weighing-room, and the police and the Republican guards succeeded in clearing it after half an hour's exertion, and by making some arrests. The report addressed to the prefect of police by the official specially charged with the supervision of race-courses says that the Duc de Castrie's mare was very fidgety at the start, and there was much difficulty in urging her into line before the fall of the flag. The report states that Sharpe was the object of insults and hootings, and that Sharpe, besides receiving some blows, sustained a contusion of the knee when dismounting. He had to jump over the gate of the weighing-room. Leo, the jockey, says in the Prix des Fortifications gave rise to the regretable incident. Some spectators did not understand that if Sharpe pulled up Blonde II. at the distance he did so to save her from falling, and at the moment he acted as he did the jockey had the greatest difficulty in the world to even keep his seat in the saddle. Some persons surrounded him and accused him of "roping." One struck him with a stick. M. Tavernier, to-day's Evenement, after recounting the incidents of the race, writes: "Immediately the public invaded the course, and an ignominious scandal occurred. Stare, who returned first to weigh, was hooted, but that was merely a prelude. The crowd fairly precipitated themselves upon Sharpe. The Duc de Castrie's jockey seeing his danger, put his horse to the gallop, but, as he passed, was assailed with insults and blows. When he thought it prudent to throw himself from his mount, he was again assailed with blows, and only succeeded in gaining the weighing-room with great difficulty. The man who followed him to the weighing-room was captured by the police, handcuffed, and conveyed to the poste. There was another arrest, and I hope the authorities of these unjustifiable outrages will receive exemplary punishment." La France says: "The moral to be drawn from the incident is that the price of admission to all suburban races must be raised so as to reduce the numbers of those who now make these races a most intolerable nuisance."

Measurement of Character.

The use of measuring man in his entirety to be justified by exactly the same arguments as those by which any special examinations are justified, such as those in classics or mathematics; namely, that every measurement tests, in some particulars, the adequacy of the previous education, and contributes to show the efficiency of the man as a human machine at the time it was made. It is impossible to be sure of the adequacy in every respect of the rearing of a man, or of his total efficiency, unless he has been measured in character and physique as well as in intellect. A wise man desires this knowledge for his own use, and for the same reason that he takes stock from time to time of his finances. It teaches him his position among his fellows, and whether he is getting on or falling back, and he shapes his ambitions and conduct accordingly. "Know thyself" is an ancient phrase in [illegible] philosophy.

OLD SAYINGS.

Looked at From a New Standpoint.

"A ROLLING STONE GATHERS NO MOSS."

Time out of mind, a rolling stone has been censured for gathering no moss. But what of that? Is it not to its credit rather than to its dispraise? If it had lain idle all its life, it doubtless would have accumulated no end of moss. But its busy existance prevented its acquiring any such useless environment. True, the rolling stone gathers no moss, but it gathered something better, to wit, polish. Isn't polish to be preferred to cumbersome and useless moss? Avast there!

"OUT OF THE FRYING-PAN INTO THE FIRE."

It is conventional to condemn the man who jumps out of the frying-pan into the fire. But, gentle reader, were you in the midst of the feraent fat of the frying-pan, would you not rather jump into the fire itself and have your anguish ended speedily and at once than to suffer the slow agony of being fried like a vulgar doughnut? Of course you would. Then never again speak a word against the judgement of this unknown martyr to expediency.

"FACTS ARE STUBBORN THINGS."

This may be true on general grounds, but we fancy that facts bearing on a political campaign are as pliant and yielding as boarding house butter. We trust, therefore, that this severe characterization of facts in the abstract will give place to a more generous appreciation. It is no nearer the truth to say that all facts are stubborn things than to affirm that all stubborn things are facts.

'FAINT HEART NE'ER WON FAIR LADY."

This is a libel on the faint heart. The modest, diffident, bashful man—that is to say, the faint heart—is always first to be won by the fair sex, which is the true way of saying that he is the first to win the fair sex; for be it known, that it is the woman and not the man, who wins in the game of hearts. The man thinks he does, but he doesn't. It is true that the winnings are often times hardly worth the taking; but be they good, bad or indifferent, the woman is the arbiter of man's matrimonial destiny every time; and the fainter the heart she assails the easier her victory.

It all Depends on the Stomach.

It is a fundamental truth, in natural science that the whole organized world is created with an especial regard to the stomach. Cuvier and the other comparative anatomists have demonstrated to evidence that a membranous digesting sack is the simplest primeval form of animal being, and as that organization progresses in complexity the stomach is ever the nucleus around which heads, hearts, legs, wings and tails are arranged, with an all but exclusive view to the especial interests of that part. While, therefore, a stomach can do very well by itself, in independence of all that we are accustomed to consider as the animal, no animal could carry on war for five minutes without a stomach. The stomach is in truth the immediate cause of the endless varieties of animal form, and digestion is the one main end of animal existence. Man himself, that perpetual object of his own admiration, is but a mere complicated zoophyte, a perfected stomach, a transcendental machine for the assimilation and elaboration of nutritious particles. To eat, and to be eaten, is the common lot of all living beings; and if men be indeed the lord of creation, it is manifestly only in the right of his omnivorous faculty.

Why She Hated Her.

"Yes," said Mrs. Gadabout, "I must say that I just hate that odious Miss Honeywell. She's forever putting her oar in. There was a splendid story about that Pembury man. It was all around town that he quarreled with his wife awfully, and that he had finally beaten her with a trunk strap and she had sued for a divorce, when that odious Miss Honeywell went to work, like the busybody that she is, and found out that Pembury wasn't married and never had had been; that he lived with his sister and that he never had a trunk strap in the house and if he did have he wouldn't have courage to strike a kitten with it, much less a woman. No wonder everybody dislikes Miss Honeywell, the hateful thing."

Wherein I'll reach the conscience of the king."

And equally true is it that Dr. Pierce's "Pleasant Purgative Pellets" (the original Little Liver Pills) are the most effectual means that can be used to reach the seat of disease, cleansing the bowels and system, and assisting nature in her recuperative work. By druggists.

There is no curiosity so penetrating as that of the fashionable world when once it is aroused, and the game deemed worthy of pursuit.

The Summer is Come.

The birds with us once more. Nature garbed in the brightest green brings joy to those who hate the cold and dreariness of winter. But Summer brings with her many other things besides green fields and singing birds. Corns sprout and grow just as if mother earth had a share in nuturing them, and no person wants them. Go, then, to the nearest drug store and buy a bottle of the great and only sure corn cure—PUTNAM'S PAINLESS CORN EXTRACTOR. A few days will relieve you of them. N. C. Polson & Co., proprietors, Kingston.

The same littleness of soul which makes a man despise his inferiors and trample on them makes him obsequious to his superiors.

Pain Cannot Stay

Where Polson's NERVILINE is used, Composed of the most powerful pain subduing remedies known, Nerveline cannot fail to give prompt relief in rheumatism, neuralgia, cramps, pain in the back and side, and the host of painful affections, internal or external, arising from inflammatory action. A 10 cent sample bottle of Nerviline will give sufficient proof of its superiority over every known remedy. Try Nerviline. Large bottles 25 cents; trial bottles only 10 cents.

The fruits of true wisdom are modesty and humility. A vain or proud man is in a positive sense an ignorant man.

Young Men! Read This.

The Voltaic Belt Co., of Marshall, Mich., offer to send their celebrated Electro-Volatic Belt and other Electric Appliances on trial for thirty days, to men (young or old) afflicted with nervous debility, loss of vitality and manhood, and all kindred troubles. Also for rheumatism, neuralgia, paralysis, and many other diseases. Complete restoration to health, vigor and manhood guaranteed. No risk is incurred as thirty days trial is allowed. Write them at once for illustrated pamphlet free.

No scene of nature is complete without the human element.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

Heaven! what a mockery! Even the lichen, the insect, lives a complete life, while we, with all our reason, so often blunder, fail and miss that which is essential to existance.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber lnd, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in the valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

RESPECT AGE.

Age should always command respect. In the case of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry it certainly does for 35 years that has been the standard remedy with the people, for Cholera Morbus, Dysentary, Diarrhœa, Colic and all bowel complaints.

The Durham Presbyterian congregations propose to re-unite.

A STRONG ENDORSEMENT.

The Clergy, the Medical Faculty, the press and the people all endorse Burdock Blood Bitters as the best system renovating blood purifying tonic known. Its work bears out their best recommend.

Gravel is taken from the Charleston pit for the Ontario & Quebec branch.

AN EX-ALDERMAN TRIED IT.

Ex-Alderman Taylor of Toronto, tried Hagyard's Yellow Oil for rheumatism. It cured him after all other remedies had failed.

The Fifth Division Court of the County of Grey will hold its regular sittings in the Town Hall, Flesherton, on Thursday, October the 30th next.

A SAD NEGLECT.

Neglecting a constipated condition of the bowels is sure to bring ill-health and great suffering. Burdock Blood Bitters regulate the bowels in a natural manner, purifying the blood and promote a healthy action of the stomach, liver, kidneys and bowels.

The Scott Act was sustained in Charlottetown, P. E. I. by a majority of 40.

Prof. Low's Sulphur Soap is highly recommended for the cure of Eruption, Chafes, Chapped Hands, Pimples, Tan, etc.

A detachment of Toronto police have been sent to Michipicoten to maintain order.

A SUCCESSFUL RESULT.

Mr. Bloomer, of Hamilton Ont., suffered for many years with a painful running sore upon one of his legs, which Baffled all attempts to heal until he used Burdock Blood Bitters, which speedily worked a perfect cure.

A legal firm in Orangeville has purchased a type writing machine and engaged a lady shorthand and type writer.

PROMPT MEASURES.

Prompt means should be used to break up sudden colds and cure coughs in their early stages. Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam does this most speedily and effectually.

A boy about 10 years old fell from a mow into a threshing machine near Orillia last Friday, and was torn to pieces.

AN AGREEABLE SURPRISE.

Those who try Burdock Blood Bitters as a regulator of the bowels, or to purify the blood, aid digestion, regulate the liver and kidneys, or strengthen tired nature, are agreeably surprised at the prompt benefit derived.

Arnprior Ont. had a $55,000 fire on Monday.

Freeman's Worm Powders require no other purgative. They are safe and sure to remove all varieties of Worms.

The town of West Carthage, N. Y., has been destroyed by fire.

A DECIDED HIT.

Hagyard's Yellow Oil touches the right spot every time when applied for rheumatism, neuralgia, pain, soreness or lameness, and internally for colds, sore throat, etc., it is equally infallible.

The Windsor house, Welland, was burned on Monday last.

A SAFE INVESTMENT.

Investing twenty-five cents for a bottle of Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the best throat and lung healer known. Cures coughs, bronchitis, asthma and all other pulmonary complaints.

The official returns place the majority for the Scott Act in Simcoe Co., at 1,188.

INHUMAN CRUELTY.

It is a barbaric cruelty to torture the weak stomachs of chronic invalids with harsh purgatives and sickening drugs, when Burdock Blood Bitters will regulate the stomach, bowels, liver and kidneys in so agreeable and effectual a manner.

The Tichborn claimant has been liberated from prison, his term having been shortened three years for good conduct.

A REMARKABLE RECOVERY.

A council of doctors declared Mrs. Adelaide O'Brien, of 372 Exchange St., Buffalo, incurable. Her liver was badly disordered; she vomited green mucous; could retain no food; skin yellow and full of humors. She was rapidly sinking, but Burdock Blood Bitters Cured her.

The magical power over pain that Hagyard's Yellow Oil possesses, outrivals the marvels of ancient times. It acts in a natural manner to subdue inflammation; cures Rheumatism, Croup, Deafness, Sore Throat, and painful injuries.

The editor of the Shelburne Economist received another threatening letter; from a female this time. She threatens to take her slipper (a number 13) to him. Clever.

BUCKLEN'S ARNICA SALVE.

The best Salve in the world for cuts, bruises sores, ulcers, salt rheum, fever sores, tetter, chapped hands, chilblains, corns, and all skin eruptions, and positively cures piles or no pay required. A GOOD RECORD.

Among the many thousand bottles of Hagyard's Yellow Oil sold annually in Canada not one has ever failed to give satisfaction. It cures rheumatism, colds and all painful complaints and injuries.

Dr. Low's Worm Syrup has removed tape worm from 15 to 30 feet in length. It also destroys all kinds of worm.

A CURE FOR CHOLERA MORBUS.

A positive cure for this dangerous complaint, and for all acute or chronic forms of Bowel Complaint incident to summer and fall, is found in Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry; to be procured from any druggist.

Scott Act.—The Vote of Stormont, Dundas, and Glengarry.—The result of Thursday's voting has astonished even the temperance people. A very large vote was polled throughout the counties. The majority was upwards of 1,700, nearly three times the number expected by the most sanguine.

USEFUL TO KNOW.

Everyone should know that Hagyard's Yellow Oil will give prompt relief; applied externally will stop any pain; and taken internally cures colds, asthma, croup, sore throat and most inflammatory complaints.

Fluid Lightening.

Fluid Lightening not only cures Toothache instantly, but also Neuralgia, Headache, Earache, Rheumatism, Lumbago and Sciatica. Pain of any kind cannot remain one minute where it is applied. When you hear of Fluid Lightning you hear of one of the greatest marvels ever known in the way of a medicine, as it never fails to cure, and not in a week or a day, but the instant it is applied to the effected part. Poetry.

Life In the Bush.

When first we came to Holland's grounds,
From where the Humber flows,
Our path was strewn full three feet deep
With winter's drifting snows.

No stately coach along the line,
Upon its wheels could go;
But sledges smooth and swift did glide
Upon the frozen snow.

Then desolation reigned supreme
And naught appeared around,
But snow clad hills and lonly streams
In icy fetters bound.

The forest stood as thick as when
Before the food it grew,
But soon a clearing long and wide
Appeared to please the view.

With sturdy arms and axes keen,
Two youths that forest felled,
And soon a dwelling rose to sight
Where late the savage yelled.

The house then was composed of logs
Upon a gentle hill,
And joined together at their ends
With scientific skill.

The cedar swamp then lent its aid
And furnished us with means
With shingles then and neatly laid
For to keep out the rains.

Her father Adam's sentence then
Upon us fell full sore,
But all with patient fortitude
Our lads and lassies bore.

The words of Israel's sage proved true,
Even here among the wilds,
And many a comfort we enjoyed
For those we left behind.

No real want we ever knew,
Though homely was our fare;
With thankful and contented hearts
We banished grief and care.

Our lads the forest ranged for game
And sometimes a fat buck
Or doe rewarded them if they
Upon their track had struck.

A blazing fire adorned our hearth
And cheerful faces round
Sat gossiping or listning
To music's lively sound.

The Matron and her Maiden then,
Like Watt's busy bee,
Improved the time with easy toil
Or vocal melody.

The Ox, the heavy plodding Ox,
Of all the Bestial train,
Was then our friend, for to his strength
We looked for future gain.

With patience slow and solemn tread,
His devious way he wound
To Sydenham's mills the nearest place,
Where flour could be ground.

The Bakers art soon turned to bread,
The flour thus obtained,
With home-made yeast, both good and pure,
The maple tree contained.

Of all the trees the forest yields,
No other can compare,
For innate virtue all thy own
Thou Sugar maple fair.

Thy useful virtues well deserve.
More commendable praise
Than can be given by me or mine
In these poor homely lays.

Thy juices manufactured can
When done at proper times,
Produce a sugar sound and sweet
As those of sunny climes.

A syrup sweet as nectar and
An acid pungent too
As that which crosses o'er the sea.
From old and famed Bordeau.

Thy wood doth make a cheerful fire and with a little art
Thy ashes forms the substance which Doth cleanliness impart.

When turned and polished it doth make.
Most splendid furniture;
O bird eye maple how I love
To have such garniture.

But now the sun in Taurus takes
His systematic place
And nature now begins to wear
A mild and cheerful face.

Grim hoary winter takes his flight,
The snow doth disappear,
And busy labour now begins
To occupy the year.

The feathered tribe now visit us
From distant sunny climes
And grateful to our ears is the Sweet music of their chimes.

The wood pecker that taps the trees
For its sustaining food,
And pigeons numberless which come
To nurish their young brood.

The woods do now begin to wear
Their bright green summer's dress,
And cattle now their pastures find
In the wild wilderness.

The strength of men and oxen joined
With fire doth clear the ground
Of lumbering, logs, and brings to view
The fertile fields around.

For the first year the settler has
No need for any plough;
The Harrow, by them, called the Drag
Being quite sufficient now.

And now with wheat and pulse and roots
The fields are thickly sown
Which genial suns and copious showers
Soon made maturely grown.

Those fields which never yet were tilled
Since Adam was a boy,
Now waves with corn and goldon wheat
The settlers hope and joy.

And then with scythe and careful rake,
Both men and maidens go
To gather in the bounteous crop which Heaven did bestow.

With rapid strokes the mower goes
Among the ripened wheat
And cuts it down in even rows
Upon the ground so neat.

The careful rake then follows him,
Held by some maiden fair,
Who rolls the swarth in even sheaves
With handiness and care.

Another hand in order comes
Who ties them with a band
And then the're placed in shocks erect
Upon the stubble land

The heavy wain by horses drawn
Was scarcely to be found
Among the settlers of the time
For many miles around.

Instead of them the ox and sleigh,
(Though they were rather slow,)
Were used to carry in the crop
And place it in the mow.

The healing art, though highly prized,
Was seldom practiced here,
For temperance and labour joined
With pure and balmy air.

It braced our nerves, our spirit cheered,
And purified our blood,
That of the doctor or his stuff
In little need we stood.

The lawyer, he was seldom seen,
And just as seldom wanted;
No litigation then had been
To jar the quiet homestead.

The pious man did not forget
The God who reigns above,
But lived in peaceful harmony
In friendship and in love.

The Ministers of God with him,
A hearty welcome found,
When ever they at stated times
Did go the circuit round.

This was the routine of our life
And of most settlers too
And should you be inclined to try,
It may be so with you.

Now settlers bare your heads with me
And give three hearty cheers,
And then go singing through the wood
The British Grenadiers.

Building an Ice-House.

We can best answer numerous inquiries about building an ice-house, by giving a discription of one we put up for our own use a few years ago. The locality selected was one affording facilities for drainage, was well shaded by trees, and conveniently near the house. The surface being sandy, was levelled, and four by six inch sills, fourteen feet long, were laid down and halved together at the corners. The plates of the same length, of two or four inch stuff, were put together in the same manner. Studs two by four, and thirteen feet long, were mortised into the sills and spiked to the plates every eighteen inches. The roof, a "square-pitch," is covered with ten-inch boards, two inches apart, and other boards of the same width nailed on as battens. Hemlock boards, nailed horizontally on both sides of the studs, cover the sides and ends; the four inch space between the other and inner siding, being filled with sawdust. There is a door at the ground level, and another just above, both being practically double, by means of horizontal boards placed on the inside as the house is filled. The roof projects over the sides about a foot, and the spaces between that and the plates are left open to afford ventilation. A layer of sawdust, four inches or more thick, was laid upon the ground, and the blocks of ice stacked upon it as closely as possible. The top of the ice is covered with a layer of marsh hay, about two feet thick. This house, if filled up to the roof, would hold about sixty tons. When half filled, there has been a considerable quantity of ice left over each year, though it has been used very freely. The cost of the house is small.—American Agriculturist for November.

A RARE PLANT.
The Wild Strawberry Plant possesses rare virtue as a cleansing, cooling, astringent, anteseptic and healing medicine, and when combined with other valuable vegetable extracts, as in Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, it is an unfailing remedy in all bowel complaints.

Can't You Sleep!

Many persons find themselves troubled by wakefulness. Some resort to the Hydrate of Chloral and other drugs to produce sleep. Such drugs, if their use is once begun, have to be continued, and in increasing doses, and every effort should be to induce sleep in some other way. Among the methods that have been suggested, is the stopping of all study or serious reading, half an hour before bed-time and to take sufficient exercise with dumb bells or Indian clubs to produce a warm glow of the body, and then jump into bed. In winter sleep in a flannel night-gown, and between blankets inside of cold sheets. The attempt, when in bed, to read some amusing novel may be made, in order to divert the mind from the wakefulness. A second method is, instead of reading, to repeat a poem with which one is familiar. Another plan is, to draw in a long, slow breath by the mouth, and force the breath out through the nose, imagining that the two currents can be distinctly seen. The mind is to be kept fixed upon the operation of breathing, and the endeavor to see the currents as they are expelled. One of our editorial associates finds relief by wetting a cloth with cold water and placing this across the forehead, and binding it in place by means of a towel. It is worth while to give either of these methods a thorough trial rather than to resort to drugs of any kind.—American Agriculturist for November.

NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER V.

To-morrow! I closed my eyes that night in an ecstacy of delight. The calm serenity of the night-skies, the gentle ripple of green leaves, the silver light of the moon, and the dark handsome face of my lover—I dared in my own heart use the word—were with me in my dreams. The song of the nightingales and my lover's voice blended harmoniously, greeting my ears with sweet melody as I dreamed on of the morrow. "Felicia—good night, Felicia!" was the burden of the melody; and its ravishing strains fell soothingly on my senses.

"To-morrow" was come. The sun was gilding the earth with its resplendent rays, the birds carolled their songs of delight, the gentle wind, kissing the flowers, wafted their perfume abroad. Nello was coming to tell me "what it all meant." I knew that one word explained it, and that that word was "love." He was coming. Patience—he would be here soon, and then my life would be crowned by the possession of his love!

I was standing under the spreading cedar boughs, anticipating in thought the happiness that was to be mine, when a letter was brought to me. I had gone thither knowing that he must pass by the spot. The golden sunlight that pierced through the drooping boughs was warm and pleasant. He would stand beside me, and he would tell me "what it all meant." Taking the letter from the bearer, a thrill passed through me. I knew by instinct that the note was from him, I opened it hastily. It ran thus—my first love-letter—

"I had hoped to be with you to-day, Felicia, as I have much to say to you. But I have just received a telegram from my agents in Ireland, and, if I want to save my property there from utter destruction, I must go at once. I shall not be long absent. I hope to be back with you before the nightingales have ceased to sing."

Though the sun was shedding its warmth around, a sudden grey chill fell over everything. All the gold seemed to fade from the sunlight, the perfume to depart from the flowers, the light from the skies, the glory from earth and sea. A mist of passionate tears rose before my eyes as I saw my cup of happiness dashed to the ground. It was not "to-morrow" after all; and I remembered how people always said that to-morrow never came. But he would return. I felt grieved, disappointed, but not fearful. Lady Saxon had often spoken to me of their Irish estate, Locofin, and had expressed a wish that Lionel would sell it. The tenants were always in rebellion against the agent, and she was nervous lest harm should come to her son. He laughed at the idea. He was not afraid of disaffection or open rebellion, so he had gone amongst them; and I——

Well, the summer was not over, the roses had not ceased to bloom. All would come right if I had but the patience to wait. I should soon again see the face I loved so well.

But, notwithstanding my self-administered solace, a chill had come over the warm summer day, and I wondered vaguely why I had allowed my own life to be so completely absorbed in his. Why should this terrible dread possess me because he was not with me? And what—oh, the horror of it!—what if he never came back!

An hour afterwards, while I was standing under the cedars a second letter came. It was from Lady Saxon. Brief, but to the point, it ran—

"Come and comfort me, Felicia—I have lost my son again! I want to talk to you about him."

I went at once. Aunt Annette kissed me with a quiet smile. I think she understood more of my affairs than she chose to let me know.

"My son, my son!" That was the burden of Lady Saxon's cry; yet she was not sorry that he had gone to Ireland, for she firmly believed in his ability to allay the anger aroused against his agent. "When the people see him, they will be sure to love him," she argued with motherly pride. "There could be no better cure for disaffection than seeing and conversing with my son."

And when the day was over she walked with me to the end of the drive.

"You have comforted me greatly, Felicia," she said. "What should I do without you? I wish you were my own daughter."

A few moments afterwards she added—

"Oh, Felicia, I should be the happiest woman in the whole wide world if Nello fell in love with you, and you agreed to marry him! I wonder, if he asked you to be his wife, whether you would say 'Yes'? I almost think you would."

I could laugh happily at the words, knowing what he had whispered to me.

"My daughter Felicia," she murmured when I had taken my seat in the pony-carriage—"fair as the sweetest flower that blows."

And with those pleasant words ringing in my ears I hastened home.

The last rays of the setting sun were falling over Jesmond Dene as I drew near; a golden light lingered on the distant sea, on the pine-wood, on the rushing river, on the green pastures and the picturesque pile of buildings which I had learned to love so well. No warning of coming tempest came to me; no shadow lay on the lovely Dene: no presentiment of coming evil possessed me, but there at the great entrance door, looking pale and anxious, stood my aunt Annette.

She held out her hands to me as I ascended the flight of marble steps.

"Welcome home, my dear!" she said; but there was a strange ring in her voice, and a troubled look was on her face. "You look tired, Felicia," she continued; "you must have a glass of wine. Come in here with me."

Somewhat to my surprise, she led the way into one of the small drawing-rooms that we seldom used, and stood by in silence while I drank the wine.

"There is a little surprise for you, Felicia," she began in a trembling voice. "Mr. Benson is here."

Mr. Benson was the family solicitor, and had for many years been intrusted with the management of the Jesmond affairs. Sir William had the most implicit faith in him. "Benson says so!" was affirmation strong enough for anything. Benson had advised him with all his investments; Benson had drawn up the will which made me, in consequence of Paul's death, heiress of Jesmond Dene; Benson had brought us down to the Dene, and had remained with us a whole week, instructing me in my new duties, and teaching me much of which I had previously been quite ignorant. It was he who had approved all my plans for building, and who had told me that I could not spend Sir William's hoarded thousands in a better fashion.

I felt no alarm at hearing that he had come, even though it was suddenly and without notice. I was much troubled about aunt Annette, for she seemed so unlike herself.

"He came soon after you had gone to Danroon," she went on nervously. "He wanted me to send for you, but I thought you should have one more happy day."

"Mr Benson would never make me unhappy," I laughed. "He is always the bearer of good news to me."

She looked at me wistfully.

"Mr. Benson desires a long talk with you on business-matters," she explained. "You had better defer it until after dinner."

"I will do that with pleasure," I answered little imagining the nature of the business.

Had I been less engrossed in my own love story, I should have known from Mr Benson's nervous hesitating manner that something of more than usual importance was amiss. While I was talking to the grave old lawyer, while I was dining with him, I was in fancy looking into my absent lover's face and listening to the notes of the nightingales.

"Can you spare an hour this evening," inquired Mr. Benson; "or shall I defer my business until the morning?"

It appeared to me that he was not unwilling to defer it. I had never seen him so unlike himself—confused, hesitating, glancing at me strangely, beginning a speech, then ending abruptly.

I said to him at last—

"You are not well, Mr. Benson."

"No, I am in great distress," he answered.

"In distress?" It was such a strange confession for him to make. "In distress?" I repeated. "You are not ill, I hope? You have not met with any misfortune?"

"I am not ill, and the misfortune that depresses me is not mine," he said.

"Not yours!" I exclaimed; and his grave manner gave an additional significance to his words.

"The fact is," he continued, looking at me, "I have, for the first time in my professional life, made a terrible mistake."

I could only repeat the words, "A terrible mistake!"

"It is not often that lawyers do that," he said. "They are generally very cautious. I fear that in this particular business I have been neither. A lawyer," he continued, "above all men, should well consider every step he takes. In this one case I did not."

He was talking to a girl whose whole soul vibrated to the music of the nightingales, and the sound of her lover's voice; and even those words, portentous as they were, did not startle her.

"Yet," he continued, "I cannot see how I could have helped it, or how I am to blame, though blame must lie somewhere."

"It does not lie with you, I feel sure," I said, with a faint attempt at consolation, and as a proof of my confidence in his legal acuteness.

"The worst of it," he continued, "is that the mistake I have made affects you."

"Then," I said, "it can be easily remedied." For, in my ignorance, I did not think there could be any mistake made which would seriously affect me.

"I am afraid," he went on disregarding my interposition, "it will be a terrible blow to you. You seem so happy here."

"I am very happy here—indeed it would be impossible for any one to be happier," I replied.

"You remember the terms of Sir William's will, Miss Gordon?" he continued.

I answered that I remembered them well.

"The whole estate descended to his son Paul. The title is hereditary; the estate is not. If Paul married and had children, it went to them. If he died unmarried, it became yours."

"Yes; and it is mine, thank Heaven?" I said.

"So I thought. Heaven knows I thought so," he answered; "but, Miss Gordon, it appears that Paul was married. He has left a widow and an only son."

CHAPTER VI.

The lawyer's words fell like poisoned arrows on my heart. Paul had left a widow and an only son! That meant that I was no longer mistress of Jesmond Dene—that the splendid inheritance I had planned to do so much good with had slipped from my grasp.

There was silence between us for some time—a silence fraught with unutterable horror to me. Mr. Benson broke it at last.

"I blame myself," he said. "I ought to have made enquiries, and have been satisfied beyond the possibility of a doubt that Paul Jesmond had not married; I ought to have ascertained that before helping to place you in possession. I am afraid it is a terrible blow to you," he added.

"Yes, it is," I replied—so great a blow that I cannot at present realize it. It has stunned me."

"It stunned me," said Mr. Benson, "I was for many hours quite unable to comprehend the result of this deplorable blunder. Now I see plainly enough what I ought to have done. I should have written to India for further information before you were formally installed as mistress of Jesmond Dene."

"It would have been better," I said mechanically. "You are quite sure that there is no mistake now?" I added.

"No, everything is too well authenticated for that. There is no mistake this time. I—I cannot tell you how grieved I am—how I blame myself; but there had never been any word of Paul's marriage. He had not mentioned it, and it seems to have been but little known, even among his friends in the Army. You bear the blow well, Miss Gordon."

Nevertheless, bravely as I bore this crushing reverse of fortune, it was a terrible blow to me. For a time it had banished the cherished memory of my lover's face. But slowly it began to return, and I took heart once more. The first thought that presented itself clearly to my mind was this—that, if he loved me, change of fortune would not affect him; and whilst I possessed his love nothing on earth could affect me. By degrees hope seemed to come back to my heart, the color to my face, clear thought to my brain. Then I realized that I was no longer mistress of Jesmond Dene, and that I must give way to my cousin's little son. I confess, between smiles and tears, that the very words "My cousin's little son" softened and warmed my heart to the child as nothing else could have done, and robbed the blow of half its bitter sting. My cousin's little son—the son of the bright-faced handsome lad who had been so kind to me in my girlhood, who had kissed me, and had promised to marry me when he had seen the world! He had married some one else, and I must give way to his child, the rightful heir to Jesmond Dene. Still my heart warmed to him for my dead cousin's sake.

"As you will remember," continued Mr. Benson, "there was no cordiality between father and son. Sir William liked to save money; Paul enjoyed spending it. The father's miserly ways made home hateful to the son. They quarrelled fiercely before they parted, and I should imagine from the tone of the letters that passed between them that they were never on friendly terms again. Sir William refused him an allowance for some time, so deeply rooted was his anger. He afterwards relented; but by that time the young man's heart was hardened. I know that Sir William wrote to him several times on the subject of marriage, urging him to take great care not to be so foolish as to fall in love—that he must not marry until he returned to England, and then he was to marry a wealthy woman. Money was to be his first consideration. Sir William told me all about these letters. He added also that he had never recived an answer to them. "That accounts," remarked Mr. Benson, "for the young fellow's silence about his marriage. There is no doubt he believed implicitly that, if his father knew of it, he would disinherit him and leave him penniless, for he married much beneath him, his wife having no dowry except a beautiful face."

"Who was she?" I asked.

"Her name was Gabrielle Fairfax," he replied, "and she was living in the family of Major Esmond as governess to his children—a very unusual thing in India; but the Esmond children were strong and healthy, and their parents did not care to part with them. She was a most beautiful and a very good girl, so Colonel Brownlow tells me, clever and accomplished, belonging to a respectable English family. She had, of course, no fortune, and no prospect of ever possessing any. Paul Jesmond fell in love with and married her. No one knew of the marriage, except Major Esmond and his wife. Paul cared not let it be known, lest his father should hear of it. He never spoke of it, even to his most intimate friends; but he told Major Esmond that when he returned to England he should take his wife straight to Jesmond Dene, and trust to her lovely face to win him his father's forgiveness. Miss Gordon, I can hear in fancy his cheery young voice saying, 'When my father sees her, he will relent.' He was always sanguine, poor Paul!"

I knew that—my bright-faced handsome cousin! Mr. Benson went on—

"He rented a pretty little house on the Neilgherry Hills for his wife, and they lived happily for two years no one guessing his secret. A son was born there; and Paul Jesmond who knew the importance of that son's birth, took the precaution of having it properly registered, and of keeping a copy of the registration. The child was christened by the resident chaplain, who, in his turn, faithfully kept the promise of secrecy that he had given. Paul took yet another precaution, which, for one so habitually careless as himself, seems to me somewhat remarkable. He gathered together the needful papers—his certificate of marriage, and the certificate of his son's birth—and placed them together, with a long letter to his father, telling him all the story of his marriage, and begging, if anything happened to him, that he would be kind to his wife and child."

"'Let little Guy succeed me,' he wrote. 'Do not visit the offences of the father on the son. However faulty I may have been, do not disinherit my boy. My marriage may displease you, but you will forgive me when you see my wife's face. And she is as good as she is beautiful. I loved her with all my heart. There comes to me, father, at times a presentiment that I shall die young. If I do, be kind to my wife and child. Let my wife have the honor that falls to the widowed ladies of Jesmond Dene, and let my son succeed to the estate. I am your only son, you will not refuse my prayer. I am writing this, so that, should anything happen to me, my wife may bring it in her hands to you, and you, in your turn, will do justice to her.'

"So runs the letter, Miss Gordon."

By that time my eyes were full of tears, and I had begun to forget my own troubles, and to think only of the handsome bright eyed lad who had loved me when I was a child, and of his little son.

"It appears," continued Mr. Benson, "that Paul fell ill very suddenly with one of those terrible maligant fevers so common in the East. He had been appointed to some slight military command where he would be detained three months. The name of the place to which he was sent, and where he died, was Faizabad. As a matter of course, he bade farewell to his wife, she knowing that the separation would be for three months; and during that time, not having expected to hear from him, she was not anxious about him. His comrade in the fatal expedition was Captain Archie Hartigan, who was by his side when he died. It seems that on the day before his death, while some little consciousness still remained, Paul placed a small package in Captain Hartigan's hands, with these words, "find out my wife, and give her this to take to my father.' Captain Hartigan intended to fulfil the commission at the earliest moment; but, even before his friend was laid at rest, he himself was stricken down with the same fever, and lay for some time hovering between life and death. Other officers were at Faizabad, and for many weeks the package left by Captain Jesmond was not delivered. The first thing that Captain Hartigan did, when restored to health, was to go to Colonel Brownlow and gave him Paul's message—'Find out my wife, and give her this to take home to my father.' The Colonel declaired that Captain Jesmond had never married. He made the fullest possible inquiries, but could obtain no confirmation of any such marriage. None of Paul's brother officers knew anything of it. Major Esmond did not belong to the same regiment; and unfortunately just at that time he was away on military business, so that there was no one to throw any light upon the m[illegible]. But, when [illegible] Esmond returned and heard what [illegible] happened, he went at once to Colonel Brownlow, and told him the whole story. The Colonel [illegible] very well pleased. [illegible] blamed [illegible] Esmond for having connived at a secret marriage of a young officer [illegible] Captain Hartigan [illegible] the young wife [illegible] to communicate to her the intelligence of her husband's [illegible]. He found her with her infant son. She was beautiful as a dream, and good as she was fair. Her distress was terrible when she learnt the bad news, for it appears that she had dearly loved her husband. At first she refused to believe that he was dead; and then she declined to go home to England. She wanted to be left alone to die in peace where he had left her. It was represented to her how greatly such a course would injure the prospects of the boy, who on his grandfather's death would in all probility become Sir Guy Jesmond and master of Jesmond Dene. For the child's sake she consented to do what she would never have done for her own—return to England, to see her huband's father. She would not however, accept any escort, though Colonel Brownlow would have placed her under the protection of an officer and his wife who were shortly returning to England. Mrs. Esmond implored her to take a maid; but she would not; she would travel alone, her only companion being her fatherless boy. Colonel Brownlow gave her the precious package, and she sailed from Calcutta in the Caspian Queen, and reached London safely."

"Reached London!" I exclaimed. "Then she is near—quite near?"

"Yes," replied the lawyer gravely. "The news of Sir William's death was not known in the regiment when she left, and Colonel Brownlow, understanding that I was the family solicitor, advised her to come straight to me. She did not do so, but allowed a fortnight to elapse, and then she came."

"Then you have seen her?" I cried.

"Yes," he answered, "I have seen her;" and the old lawyer was strangely silent after that.

"What about her?" I asked eagerly. "What do you think of her?"

"She is simply the most beautiful woman I ever beheld," he replied.

"And good as beautiful?" I asked again.

"I could not judge; she was not with me very long—though long enough to convince me that her claims are valid and legal. She is Lady Jesmond, and her son is Sir Guy."

"Heaven bless my cousin's little son, Sir Guy!" I managed to say, although my eyes were blinded with tears.

"I am glad, I am thankful that you bear it so well," said Mr. Benson, "I have never felt so anxious or so unhappy in my life as I have felt over this unfortunate business. But who would have thought that Paul would marry entirely for beauty, and then hide his wife in the Neilgherry Hills?" I do not know what would have been the result of this match if Sir William had lived."

"You say Paul married her entirely for her beauty; surely he must have loved her?"

"Yes, there is no doubt he did," he replied. Still there was a significant hesitation in his manner.

"You do not like her?" I said, divining, as I believed, his true thoughts. I put the question so suddenly that he had no time to think before he answered.

"No—indeed I do not," with an air of great relief. "But she will be here to-morrow, Miss Gordon. She would not come with me, but it was arranged that she should follow me."

THE EDUCATION OF "PUSSY."

The Playful Companion of Two Unfortunates.

Prince Krapotkin's experiment with "Pussy," the companion of his captivity, has been repeated by M. Emile Gautier, his fellow prisoner, who during his detention at Clairvaux has studied very closely the intelligence of the cat. The result of his experiments are published in the Revue Scientifique. M Gautier says: "It is literally true what Krapotkin says, that 'Pussy'—whose education, it should be mentioned, has been particularly careful—recognizes her image in a glass, distinguishes the different signs of the prison clock, plays hide-and-seek with the same seriousness and the same interest as little children, etc. It is also correct that she understands (at least she behaves as if she understood) the significance of a few words. I am even disposed to believe that she is not indifferent to Gounod's music. But these are not the most surprising features. Among those which Krapotkin has omitted to cite there is one which has always struck me more than all others, and which I now submit to you. I ought to tell you that nature has ornamented my head with a luxurious mass of hair. Krapotkin, on the other hand, is extremely bald. This difference was used by our little companion for a singular intrigue. It has often happened when both played with her that she softly passed her paw over our respective heads as if to ascertain that her eyes did not deceive her. This inspection concluded and the visual notions confirmed by touch, her physiognomy took the air of comic surprise. The variety of sensations perplexed her, and she did not dissimulate the feeling. Nearly every evening the scene was gone through, to our great edification, as you may imagine. Another strange thing was her unaccountable fear of the warders. She had been born within the walls of the prison, and belonged to an old family of prison cats. Heredity and the influence of the same surroundings ought to have overcome this antipathy. This, however, was not the case. No sooner did she espy the abhorred uniform at the end of the dormitory or cell than she fled with every sign of terror. Even if one held her at the moment it was prudent to let her go at once, otherwise she knew how to scratch. Nothing was of any use, neither smiles nor frowns. With us, on the contrary, she allowed herself all kinds of familiarities.

A Sermon Spoiled.

"What seems to be the matter?" he asked, mildly, as they were returning from church; "didn't you enjoy the sermon?"

"Enjoy the sermon?" she repeated, shortly, "and that odious Mrs. Smith sitting directly in front of me with a new fall wrap on that never cost a cent less than $125. You must think I have a very warm religious temperament."

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinay success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

AGRICULTURAL.

SWINE BREEDING AND FEEDING.

S. J. PELTON.

Swine breeding and feeding in the central and western portions of the United States have become a business of almost gigantic proportions. It is a common thing to meet with farmers who keep from 25 to 100 head on farms of 160 acres, where ten years ago only three or four were kept for family use. Of the different breeds, the most common are the Berkshires and Poland Chinas, with an occasional herd of Essex, Chester-White, or the latest novelty, Duroc Jersey. There seems to be considerable rivalry between the breeders of Berkshires and Polands; in some localities the majority favor one breed, and in others, the other.

The principal aim of the breeder should be to get healthy, vigorous pigs, that will come to maturity quickly, and furnish the most pounds from a given amount of food. The days of breeding sows to scrub males are past; what we now want, is careful selection of both male and female. Choose the best natives, or the common stock of the country, and cross them with pure bred males, and the results will be very satisfactory. The pigs seem to take all of the good qualities of the male, while the excess of bone and offal, common to the natives, is greatly toned down.

A little personal experience in breeding may not inappropriately be mentioned. In September, 1879, I purchased a pure-bred Berkshire boar, and crossed him on common stock; the results were very gratifying—so much so that many of the neighbors patronized the animal, some even coming the distance of ten miles, and all obtained equally satisfactory results. The idea that I most wish to impress is, that money judiciously expended in the purchase of pure-bred males is money invested at a good rate of interest. What investment will pay a man better? I had 40 pigs that made an average of 339 pounds when 11 months old as the results of a first cross between my Berkshire and the common stock. For breeding, select long, rangy sows that are from good mothers; cross these with a fine-boned, compact, heavy-hammed and shouldered male; care should be taken to select males that have short legs and small heads and ears. It is always best to breed from old sows; there is less risk to be run; they are better mothers and produce more milk than the young ones.

I prefer to have my pigs to come in March or even as early as January, and then keep them thriving till I am ready to sell. Pigs reared in this way should be kept in a warm stable or pen, with the sow, till two or three months old. Great care should be used not to feed the sow much for two or three days after farrowing, for fear of creating fever. After that time, she must have all of the bran, cornmeal and barley-meal with milk that she will eat up clean. The pigs will soon learn to eat. When warm weather comes and clover begins to start, they may be turned into a small large after "ringing," and there is no danger but that they will thrive. The days of feeding swine in a mudhole of a pen are past; now, plenty of range in the pasture with pure water, is the most preferred of all conditions of profitable hog raising.

In many localities, where from 40 to 100 or more acres of corn are raised, the swine do their own feeding; they are turned into a portion of the field and allowed to hus for themselves. While this method is in favor with many, I still adhere to the good old way of saving the stalks for fodder, and feeding the corn by the basketful. Pretty good pork may be made by feeding pumpkins in the fall. Hogs of this kind, which were very numerous last season, are called "skips." I have grown pork on nothing but clover and water in the summer, and finished with slops, soft corn, pumpkins and boiled potatoes, with good results. The main item in feeding is to keep the animal healthy, and then it will eat well.

A few years ago it was a very common practice to keep June to September pigs over Winter, and with much crowding get them fat by the next October; such a practice now seems a little too long and expensive. Competition and the market demand quickly-made pork, which shall be healthy and eatable. Who wants to eat pork that has been stunted and half starved through the first half of its existence? Quickly-grown pig pork, tender and juicy, will always be in demand at the highest prices.

Keep your herd of swine respectable and clean; feed them clean and proper food and drink—breed well, feed well, and then sell well, and your efforts will be crowned with success and a good profit.

Cutting Corn for Fodder.

Corn will ripen and mature even if the stalk is cut while the grain is still in the milk so as to be practically as good for feeding purposes on the farm as that suffered to ripen in the ordinary way, although it might not be quite so acceptable in the markets. And the difference in feeding value between corn-fodder cut up before frost and before the stalks have become too hard and woody, and cornstalks left standing in the open field or not cut and shocked until after frost has struck it, can scarcely be compared, either as regards its sustaining or fattening qualities or the relish with which cattle will eat it. It is generally calculated by the farmer that the grain alone pays for the raising of the corn crop, and the feed realized from the fodder may be considered as so much clear gain. There is a great deal of it upon an acre, and it will certainly pay to save it in as good shape as possible and when possessing its highest feeding value, which can only be done by cutting it up early before it is fully matured, and before the frosts have had an effect upon it. Even when other feed is abundant, we believe it will not pay to neglect the corn-fodder, because other kinds of feed will keep, and in many localities can be disposed of to some advantage. At any rate, the cattle like a change now and then, and a turn to good, sweet, well-cured corn-fodder will be in every way beneficial.

BURN THE HASSOCKS.—At this season of the year time is well spent that is employed in cutting the hassocks on meadow land with a carpenter's adze. They can be thrown into the hog pen, although it takes them some time to decompose, but the best way of getting rid of them is to pile them up, and when they get dry cart them to some gravelly knoll and burn them. The ashes are the very best fertilizer that can be applied, as they contain no weed seeds, and are, as it were, the essence of muck. It will not do to burn them in the meadow where they are cut, as the entire soil may take fire, and be burned down to the clay-pan. In England upland pastures are often pared and burned, the entire surface sward being cut off with spades, dried and burned. It is especially beneficial to clayey soils, and to those impregnated with iron, the fire converting the iron into what is known as a peroxide, in which state it is harmless to vegetation.

HARRY ENGLISH'S CAREER.

A Once Noted Outlaw Again Arrested as He Stepped Out of the Penitentiary.

When Harry English stepped out of the penitentiary at Allegheny recently he was accosted by two tall men dressed in dark clothes, writes a correspondent from Bradford, Pa. They were detectives, and they wanted Harry English for forgery. The ex convict, a short and finely proportioned man, who had just served three years and six months for a similar crime, held out his hands for the manacles. On Wednesday the detectives brought English to Bradford, and on Thursday he was placed in a cell at Smithport, where he will await trial.

English has a remarkable story. Prior to 1880 he lived with his wife and three children on Washington street, in Bradford. He was for a time in the employ of Mayor Broder. In the spring of 1880 he removed his family to Caledonia, Elk county. In the meantime he had quitted the lumber business, and took lessons in penmanship. He was so successful that at the February term of the McKean county court, several indictments were found against him for forgery.

Detectives Morrill and Wilmoth, of Bradford, called at his home in the forest at Caledonia, but he was gone. After remaining in the vicinity several days, and finding no traces of their man, the detectives returned home. Postmaster Dixon kept them posted as to the whereabouts of English. Early in April Dixon wrote that English was at home, and that he had threatened to take his (Dixon's) life. He tesought the officers to come and take the young man at once. A posse consisting of Constables Frank Warnith, Philip Vollmer, and Thomas J. Burke, a justice of the peace, after firing up with liquor, started for the home of the outlaw. English was in front of the house. To Constable Warnith's demand to surrender he replied: "Never alive." Then he ran into the house, with Warnith and Burke close at his heels. As he bounded up the stairs the pistol of Warnith was discharged, the bullet striking English in the leg. English dashed into his sleeping-room and pulling down a Winchester rifle, fired through the door, killing Warnith. Burke dragged the body out into the yard. Later on Constable Vollmer was fatally wounded by a bullet from English's Winchester. Soon afterward English sent out word that he would surrender if he was permitted to shoot Jack Burke. This request was refused.

Although badly wounded in the leg, English left the house and made a dash for liberty. The posse and a number of armed citizens fired at the fleeing man, who was wounded in seven different places, but escaped to the woods. For three days he lay hidden under a bunch of willows within three miles of his house. He then made his way to the house of a relative in a remote neighborhood, where his wounds were dressed. Afterward he went to Canada, and thence worked his way into the wilds of Michigan, where he engaged himself to a half breed Indian as a fisherman. Here he was discovered by one of his old Bradford friends, who, spurred on by the reward of $2,200 offered by Elk and McKean counties for the outlaw's apprehension, gave his companion away. In July, 1880, a Pinkerton detective surprised English as he was returning from a day's fishing. Loaded down with irons, he was a few days later placed in the jail at Ridgway. In September of the same year he was tried on the charge of murdering Constable Warnith. It was shown by the testimony that the constables who attempted his arrest were under the influence of liquor, and that they fired shots into the house when within easy gunshot range. Then, too, the constable had fired the shot. On September 27 the jury decided that English was not guilty. At the January term of court, in 1881, English was tried for feloniously shooting Constable Vollmer. Again he was acquitted, but he was not allowed to go free. At the same term of court he was found guilty of forgery, and on March 29 he was sentenced to serve four years in the penitentiary. By his exemplary conduct he received a commutation of six months.

He was brought to McKean county to answer to a charge of forgery preferred by O. D. Coleman, of Kane. The forged check, which was for $112, was drawn on the First National bank of Olean, N. Y. Prison fare evidently agreed with English, who weighs 215 pounds. He is a blacksmith, and, by working over time, saved up considerable money. At the time of the murder public feeling was strong against him, but the general impression now is that he has been punished severely enough.

On London Bridge.

The sun fairly up, who shall describe the scene which immediately ensues upon a London bridge. The rattling and rumbling and thundering of teams, light and heavy, grows in volume and ear-splitting din with every moment that passes. Two currents of streaming humanity, equally divided by the roadway, and occupying the two sides of the bridge, pour unceasingly over its surface and empty constantly into the great sea, which is never full, beyond. As the hour for opening business and working operations approaches, faster and more nosily flows the stream, until the torrents rush on remorselessly, unheeding, overwhelmingly. Counter currents are like special trains upon a railroad—they have no right of way, and must present no obstacles to the regular, customary movements. Loiterers and intruders and interlopers are of small account, and have few respected rights. A block here and now, from any cause, over six feet of space, would instantly influence the conduct of thousands of people in the vicinity. Long continued, it would result in something like a panic; but it seldom occurs or is allowed to take place. Henceforth, until long after the sun's setting, there will be no cessation of the surging of the human tide.—[Correspondence Boston Herald.

In great Pain and Consternation he Rushed down to the office and sought out the Proof-Reader and exclaimed:

"Alas! that you should have made me the Victim of Ridicule and Contempt! I feel as if I could Paralyze you!"

"Gently, my Friend," was the calm reply "Had you halted at the door below you would have found the Editor writing a Second Page Article in Praise of this very Sentence, which he Declares to be Original and bound to have a Run. My Inadvertence will make you Famous."

The French Hair Trade Affected by War with China.

The troubles in China are unfavorably affecting one of the most important minor industries of Marseilles, and may interfere with female heads all over Europe in a way their owners little expect. China has ceased to send hair to France, whether because its export has been interdicted by authority or because Chinese dealers in the article are too patriotic to deal with their enemies, has not yet been ascertained. The Iraouady, which arrived in August from Hong Kong, brought only three bales of this interesting merchandise, and the Sindh, which arrived last month, brought but a single case.

Marseilles is the principal human hair market in Europe. The imports average 80 000 kilogrammes (about 80 tons), of which fully one half come from China. For the rest Italy supplies 22,000, Cochin China 1 347, the English East Indies 2,000, Japan 538 Algeria 431 Turkey 98, Austria 57, and Spain 13 kilogrammes. Thus Caina, Cochin China, and Japan furnish a greater quantity than Italy, which was formerly the sole source of supply.

As education extends it becomes increasingly difficult to persuade young women in Europe to part with their tresses. The only parts of France where any can still be procured are Brittany and France. The trade has grown enormously. In 1865 the imports into Marseilles were no more than 17,000 kilogrammes, but since "plaits" came into vogue the demand for hair has created not alone a large commerce, but an important industry. There is something almost appalling in the idea of eighty tons of perukes, plaits, and false fronts, France, however, profits by it, and wigs all the world—certainly all the women in central Europe. This is proved by a curious and suggestive calculation. Marseilles reserves for his own consumption 3,000 kilogrammes, of which 300 are made into peukes for men and 2,700 into postiches for women. Now as one kilogramme of hair makes on the average ten coiffors, it is evident that the sale of postiches must be at the rate of 27,000 a year, and as a postiche lasts three years, it follows further that 84,000 women in Marseilles—pretty nearly the whole of the female adult population—must be wearers of false hair in one shape or another.

Applying the like rule to the balance of the hair imported into Marseilles we find that after deducting the same proportion for the wigs of men, there remains for the use of the fair sex in France and elsewhere 70,000 kilogrammes—equal to an annual sale of 600,000 postiches. Hence the number of women who procure their false hair directly or indirectly from Marseilles must be upward of two millions. But as Marseilles, though the great mart, is not the only place to which human hair is consigned, there are probably many more bewigged women in Europe than these figures denote.

THE PANGS OF STARVATION.

Horrible Sufferings Caused by a Lack of Food and Water.

"When I look back to my own brief experience and think of the poor fellows of the Greely expedition, and the long and weary months they suffered in the Arctic regions, I think the mantle of charity and forgetfulness should be thrown over their action," says George W. Brower, an ex-coxswain of the navy, who had been attached to the ill-fated steamer Tallapoosa. Continuing, he said: "I was coxswain of one of the boats of the Tallapoosa when she was attached to the gulf squadron. One evening when returning from a boat expedition we were caught in a terrific squall and our boat was capsized near a small island. My crew managed to reach the shore, but our boat drifted away in the darkness. We lay down in the bushes and slept that night, and when morning broke we realized that we were on a desolate island. We explored the island, and found on it only underbrush and trees, nothing in the shape of food and water. We had only to hope that we would soon be rescued. The gale continued with violence, and we spent another night in our bed of bushes.

"On the following morning we began to feel the pangs of hunger and thirst, and finding an old barrel on the beach we broke it up and used the staves to dig for water, which we found so brackish that we could not drink it. Then we set up a pole on a cliff, with a shirt of one of the men fastened on it as a signal of distress. Our sufferings from thirst were indescribable. We passed the third night and day on the island without any change, excepting one incident. With a companion I started on a tour round the island, it being our practice to take turns to search for a passing vessel that we might signal, and going through a clump of woods saw a cormorant, a bird of carrion considered unfit to eat. I killed it with a club and we ravenously tore it in pieces and sucked its blood, which, in our condition, we found refreshing. But we did not mention the fact to our comrades upon our return to camp. The morning of the fourth day broke with excessive heat, and one of our party was so delirious that it required two of us to subdue him. Our tongues had so swollen that we could scarcely speak above a whisper. Our lips were also cracked and split with the intense heat.

"In the afternoon one of the men who had been on his tour was observed running toward the camp, and we could just distinguish as he came nearer that he was crying a boat, a boat.' Those who were able started toward the end of the island where our distress signal was flying, and we distinguished a boat approaching us from the distance. As it approached the shore we recognized it as the launch of the Tallapoosa. As the officer came on shore we begged him to give us water. He gave us a couple of swallows each which made us crave for more, but it was denied to us. Then a fire was made on the beach, and in a few moments a pot of hot coffee was ready. Of this we received only a few swallows each, and then we were given a few pieces of pilot bread soaked in the coffee. Then we were assisted into the boat and taken to the ship, which we reached late at night. A few days of careful feeding and tender nursing restored us to our former strength. I have often thought how thankful I was to God for that rescue. Persons who have never had like experience can form no idea of the terrible sufferings of men in that condition; and those persons who so harshly criticise the survivors of the Greely expedition, if placed amid similar surroundings, would no doubt adopt the same course."—[New York Tribune.

MAN-EATING TIGERS.

Forty People Killed by them in One Month in an Indian Province.

Mr. H. G. Tunner, acting agent to the governor of Vizagapatam, writes to the chief secretary to the Madras government, from Lothugedda, as follows: "I have the honor to report that the neighborhood of this village, together with the adjoining villages belonging to Gangaraz Madgole, are invested with man-eating tigers to such an extent as to render some special measures being taken for their destruction a matter of urgent importance. During the last four months upward of forty people have been killed in the vicinity of the police stations of Paderu, Nandapoor, Padawa and Sujankota. In the neighborhood where I am now encamped, which is within the circle of the Lamsinghi police station, upward of thirty-five people have been killed in the last twelve months, and in both places there is a weekly recurrence of deaths from the same cause. The panic that exists here is terrible. People will not go out of their houses after dark. They are obliged to gather in large parties to go to market; villages are deserted; cultivation is pursued under the greatest difficulty and in constant trepidation. This morning I was shown a deserted village, abandoned on account of the tiger terror. Recently a man and his wife were ploughing a field near this abandoned village, when a tiger attacked the man in the middle of the day. He hit him with a bill hook, and the tiger turned on the woman and carried her off before his eyes. On the same road I was shown two spots where the tiger carried off two men in one day. Yesterday I was shown a place where a tiger sprang upon a constable, knocked him down, and mauled him so severely that he died the next day. This constable was one of a guard who were escorting about one hundred people home from market. Three days ago a village munsif came to see me, with the story that a tiger got into his yard in the middle of a village, seized his wife, and although he beat it off, the poor woman died next day. I came up here with Mr. Lushington and Messrs. Egan and Stuart from Jaypore, joined our camp with the hope of getting a chance at this brute, and the maharajah of Vizianagrum, with his usual public spirit, has lent me some shikar elephants; but the hopes of finding a tiger in such an immense area of forest are very dim indeed, and I am afraid no good will come of our efforts. There is some chance that this particular tiger of this neighborhood was killed by one of the constables, who got a shot at him when he was carrying off his comrade, as I have mentioned above. But north and west of us stories of ravages continue to come in; and a tiger killed a man at Gangarra Magdole within the last four days. We have been in consultation as to what is to be done in this dreadful position of affairs, and we are unanimously of opinion that the only thing to do is to supply certain villages with police carbines and ammunition, and endeavor to persuade the villagers to endeavor to kill these beasts themselves, giving the usual reward of 100 rupees for tan ordinary tiger, and a special reward of 200 rupees for the well-established death of a man eater. I have inquired of a few villagers, who tell me that their guns are no good, being matchlocks, that they have no guns, that their guns were lost in the flouri. I therefore think it likely that this unprecedented human slaughter may arise from an unusual dearth of firearms in the country. It is clear to me that if something is not done to stop these ravages the country-side will be gradually depopulated. I should say that at least six villages have been abandoned quite recently from this cause, and this means that lands have fallen out of cultivation, that the people try to live on jungle produce, and, failing in that, go off to the plains as laborers. It is not only the absolute danger to life that we have to think about, but likewise this disastrous stopping of all agricultural operations. It is horrible to contemplate the feelings of a poor laborer going out for his day's work to a field a few hundred yards from his house, with the knowledge about him that there is an even chance of his being carried away from the side of his plow, or that his wife may be seized when she is bringing him his mid-day meal. Yet this is, and must be, the attitude of mind of every man in this country who pursues the usually peaceful vocation of the husbandman."—London Globe.

PERSONAL NEWS.

About a Few of the Prominent People of The Day.

Mr. Gladstone amused himself a few days ago by ascending and descending one of the highest mountains in Scotland. The route was circuitous, and the distance about twenty miles.

Felix Moschelles, the English portrait painter is about to return so New York. He left suddenly in the spring on account of the illness of his mother. She is entirely well again, and he has since then covered a good many canvases in London, and is soon to be back in New York with some blank ones.

Prince Edward, son of the Prince of Wales, will travel in Canada and the United States next year.

The heirs of the late James L. Claghorn, of Philadelphia, have refused an offer of $120,000 for his magnificent collection of engravings and etchings, among which are three hundred Rembrandts.

Hans Makart, the distinguished Austrian painter, who recently became violently insane, died on the 3d inst. at Vienna, from inflammation of the brain. His chief hallucination was that his head was a box full of pigments, which he wanted, but could not get at. His malady suddenly took a fatal turn and he died in great agony.

The Rev. W. H. H. Murray, who five years ago was filling Music Hall, Boston, with his eloquence in the presence of vast audiences, is now the proprietor of the "Snowshoe Cafe" in Montreal. Last year he was in the lumber business in Texas.

Says the Baltimore American: "Mr. John W. Garrett was a citizen of Baltimore, one who loved his city, and who with wonderful success devoted all his best energies for the furtherance of her interests, dying while completing the self-imposed task. A movement inaugurated by prominent members of the commercial bodies for the erection by private subscription of a memorial would, we do not question, meet with ready response, and be crowned by deserved success.

A foreign correspondent writes that Thiers handshake was brusque and dry, but not unpleasant; that Gambetta's contrasted with his apparent openness and heartiness, and did not express character; that Clemenceau's is nervous and rapid and with a friend very friendly; that Grevy scans your face in a good-humored way while holding your hand; and that Victor Hugo shakes hands after the manner of a grandoise statue into which, as into Galatea, the breath of life has been breathed.

Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt: "I am living a private life, and I am enjoying myself. My health is splendid and I enjoy the society of my family. I go for a walk in the morning and a ride in the afternoon, when circumstances will admit, and I find a quiet life all that I expected it to be. I think I have good reason to congratulate myself that I know when to retire. There are few who are satisfied to stop, and they keep on until the end stops them. I have retired from business, and if my name is mentioned in connection with railroad stocks, don't ask me. My sons Cornelius and William K. attend to all my affairs now."

An Honest Beggar.

A benevolent lady investigated the wants of some professional beggars the other day.

"Where is the blind man?" she asked of a little girl she met at the door of the tenement-house.

"He's readin' der paper, mum."

"Ah! And where is the deaf man?"

"He's talkin' politics wid de butcher."

"And what has become of the paralytic?"

"He is abed, mum."

"Well, that's strange. He ought to be running a race," replied the lady, sarcastically. "He's the only honest beggar in the building. Why is he in bed?"

"Because he's dead mum."

Prince Bismarck's Fish Preserves.

Prince Bismarck has been going in strongly for artificial pisciculture during the last three years at Friedtichsruhe, and every stream and lake on or near his estate is now well stocked with fish. The Prince has an extensive breeding establishment at Graude, near Friedrichsruhe, from which 10,000 young trout have lately been sent out to neighboring waters. He obtained a large stock of trout from the celebrated ponds at Wolfsbrunnen, near Heidelberg, which are, or at least which ought to be, well known to many of my readers.

A Facetious Father.

"Pa, can money talk?"

"That's what betting men say, sometimes my son.'

"What can it talk, pa?"

"I suppose it can talk good cents.'

The Standard.

MARKDALE OCT. 30, 1884.

PASSED AWAY.—Mr. James Sproule of Osprey, father of Dr. Sproule, M. P. for East Grey, died at his residence last Thursday, 23rd inst., at the age of 68 years. Mr. Sproule received injuries from a horse last winter, from which he did not recover. He was a resident of Osprey township for 32 years, and was highly respected by all who knew him. His remains were followed to their last resting place on Saturday by a large concourse of sorrowing friends and acquaintances, and interred in the Presbyterian cemetery at Maxwell.

Our Patrons.

The year is drawing to a close, and the time for renewing your subscription is also at hand. Now we wish to give you a little advice. Should the STANDARD fail to give satisfaction as a local paper, we will be glad to hear any suggestion our patrons may give, for the improvement of the paper. We do not by any means expect to please every body, neither do we expect to adopt every improvement or supposed improvement that may be suggested, yet we may be able to materially improve the paper and profit by such a course, and we assure you we will use our best endeavors to continue to improve the STANDARD so that it may not loose its popularity. We will continue to send the paper to present subscribers after their subscription has expired if we are not notified to discontinue it. The greater majority of subscriptions expire at the end of the year and we trust that very few will allow that time to pass without renewing. Of course there are always some who, for various reasons, do not wish to renew; however, we hope the number will be mighty small. There is a thousand and one ways whereby our patrons can help to improve the paper, besides being prompt paying subscribers: there are incidents happening in every locality which we will be glad to have reported either in writing or verbal, by any subscriber. Now see what you can do for the time to come. Should we receive an occasional Dominion bank note inclosed with other notes we'll not squeal.

Flesherton.

From our own corresondent.

Mr Will Thompson, who has been in the employ of W. Barnhouse, boot and shoe maker, for over three years, bid farewell to our village last week, having accepted a situation in the town of Stayner. Mr. Barnhouse regretted very much to part with Mr. Thompson who is a first-class workman and a faithful and trust worthy employee whose equall he says is seldom met with. During his stay in our village Will had won, by his gentle manly conduct exemplary christian life, and esteem of many, and was regular and constant worker among the Sons of Temperance. We wish him every success in his new field of labour.

Mr. George Stewart, President of the Flesherton Cheese Factory Co., sold last week to Messrs. Jackson and Hallett, of Guelph, over ten and a half tons of cheese, for which he realized the handsome sum of nearly two thousand and a half of dollars. This amount covering six weeks making of cheese and distributed among the patrons in this vicinity ought to, and no doubt will make cash a little more flush in some quarters Mr. M. Richardson, of this village, acts as Banker for the patrons this season.

Still they come: George H. Blackburn, of Feversham, boot and shoe maker, has moved into our village. We have three boot and shoe shops for ordered work and all driven hard.

Master David Clayton, since opening out in the harness business in our town, seems to be doing a rushing business.

Grain is being stored in the C. P. R. elevator on account of a block in Montreal yard. Over 150 000 bushels has already arrived at this port.

The Athabasca arrived in Port Arthur Saturday morning at 7 o'clock with 16,000 bushels of wheat. The Algoma arrived at Port Arthur 11 o'clock Sunday night. They experienced some very stormy weather. Captain reports heavy snow storms all the way up.

Owen Sound station has two telephone lines in connection; one operated by the Bell Telephone Co., the other by the Owen Sound Co., of which Mr. H. Durie holds the agency. Lots of music for the boys.

Steam barge Georgian, which was sunk at Little Current, is unloading her cargo of rails. She then goes in the Dry Dock.

A big smash-up occurred in the C. P. R. yard about 2:30 a. m. Monday in shunting the early express, which goes east at 5:20 a. m. The yardman after reversing the train, proceeded to the lower end of the yard where some cars were foul of the main line. When the cars struck they were going at a high rate of speed, smashing the baggage car and smoking car so as to disable them completely; also throwing five flats and some coal cars off the track. More cars had to be got for the express train which leaves at 5:20 a.m., and by the good engineering of the car repairers they got the track clear so as to only detain the express fifteen minutes.

What we may Expect.

An open fall,

And a mild winter.

S. S. ANNIVERSARY.—The most successful annual entertainment yet held by the Markdale Methodist Sabbath School, took place on Tuesday evening last. Notwithstanding the very bad state of the roads, a goodly number from the country were present, and the church was well filled. After full justice was done in supplying the inner man, at the Orange Hall, the company repaired to the church, where the intellectual part of the exercises took place. The Cantata was well rendered, and reflects great credit on those who took part, especially the Superintendent, Mr. Bowes, who toiled with such untiring perseverance during many weeks in preparing and practising the school in the various parts. Short addresses were given by Revs Wilson, Grandy, Dr. Sproule, and the chairman Rev. Mr. Casson. The Dr's. address was specially appropriate and well received. The financial total was also very satisfactory, and the funds will be appropriated towards purchasing books, papers, and other supplies for the school.

Markdale, Sept. 1, 1884. 190-tf WM. BROWN.

THE TRUTH OF IT.

Some months after this conversation with my extraordinary clerk, Sir William Jarvis, an old client of mine, died. I was summoned to attend his funeral, and to read the will afterward. The day before I went down to his country-house, I thought it would be as well if I looked through the draft of his will, in order to be familiar with its provisions. His box was brought in, and I soon put my hand upon the document I wanted. It was dated in 1867—the year Wilson came to me—and the draft was in my clerk's handwriting. It was a voluminous document, consisting of a good many sheets of paper, joined together at the corner. To the front page was affixed a slip of white paper, bearing sundry memoranda—also in Wilson's handwriting—suggesting, most likely, a few alterations to be made if I approved of them.

As I bent this piece of paper back, to read the words concealed, I saw writing on the other side of it, and my heart stood still as I knew that the writing was identical with the writing of those words which had been stamped upon my brain since the day of Roland Northwick's death.

With trembling hands I detached the slip of paper, opened my secretaire, and laid it side by side with the notes of warning. I had been deceived by no fancied resemblance, the writing was the same, and so peculiar was the penmanship that I felt convinced that no chance could have produced these two specimens from different persons. True; the writing on the newly-found paper was better and firmer than on the other; but I compared letter for letter and found them exactly alike in their formation. The hand that wrote one wrote the other: and as the two slips of paper lay before me I felt that the murderer of Roland Northwick had had his day. Then, with professional instinct, I sat down to think calmly over my discovery. The paper which I had so unexpectedly found contained what appeared to be a portion of Byron's "When we two parted." Probably the writer was an admirer of the poet, and had transcribed it for her own pleasure. The paper had been torn, lengthways, down the centre: so that only the first halves of the lines were left. But this was more than enough—I could have sworn to the identity of the writing had only two letters appeared.

Now came the difficulty. How could I connect the two papers? What theory could I form? Here, through an extraordinary chance, was the clew starting from my very office. Here it had been lying for five years. Now that it was within my hands, whither would it lead? Could it be possible that Wilson was in any way mixed up in the affair? I shuddered at the thought, and felt inclined to dismiss it as preposterous. At first I even contemplated asking him point-blank whose writing it might be on the back of the slip of paper he had used; but recognizing the necessity for extreme caution, I decided not to do so. I endeavored to throw my memory back to the time when Sir William's will was made. Looking through my old diaries, I found that about that date we had a press of business in hand; but I could recollect nothing more than taking Sir William's instructions, and, afterward, seeing him execute the will. I felt I must endeavor to get some more information before I took any decisive steps; so, pinning the two pieces of paper together I placed them in my pocket-book and sent for Mr. Wilson. I was quite composed when he entered, and running over the sheets of the draft, asked:

"Do you remember the circumstances under which you drew this up? I ask, as there are several little things in it I should have worded differently."

Wilson took the paper in his hand, looked at the date and replied:

"It was one of the first things I did for you, before I had quite caught your style. I remember, as we were very busy, I drafted it at home, and you altered a good deal of it before it was fair copied."

Then this fact was pretty well established; the paper, whoever wrote it, came from Wilson's house. I saw clearly that my first proceeding was to ascertain everything I could respecting his antecedents and private life. I looked up my letters of 1867, and found from them that Wilson had been recommended to me by Forbes and Thwaites, of Bristol, a firm of high standing. Having ascertained this much, I went in search of a private inquiry agent. I hated the idea of having to spy on one of my household, as it were, but the serious nature of the case gave me no option.

"Can you attend to a bit of business for me?" I said. "A few private inquiries I want made."

"Certainly, sir," replied the agent, producing his note-book; "we are rather slack just now."

"I want you to go to Bristol to-night. Inquire there of Messrs. Forbes and Thwaites solicitors, from what part of the world James Wilson came. He was bankrupt in 1866, I believe, and they were concerned."

The heads of my instructions were rapidly jotted down.

"Then you will go to the place at which he originally lived, and find out all you can about him. His connections, private life, etc."

The agent nodded.

"Then you will ascertain his private address in London, and get all particulars you can of his history since he came to town. As soon as you know enough, write me, and I will call for your report."

"Case of defalcation, I suppose?" said the man, closing his note-book.

"Something of the sort," I replied, and wished him good morning.

I did not choose to take anyone into my confidence this time. I would get all the links together before I put the chain into other hands.

In five days' time the agent sent me word that his report was ready. I had been anxiously awaiting it, so hastened to hear what he had discovered.

There was a good deal in it that was of no consequence whatever; but the detective had done his duty in getting the fullest information. Sifting out all extraneous matter, I learned as follows:

James Wilson was of respectable family. He had been well educated, then articled to a firm of solicitors. Afterward he set up in practice at a rising watering-place on the Bristol Channel, where, as I have already stated; he became involved in some unfortunate building transactions, failing in consequence. He had married, whilst in practice, the daughter of a well-to-do retired tradesman; but as several members of his wife's family lost considerable sums of money by his failure, they became completely estranged. Wilson came to London in 1867, taking lodgings at Chelsea. His wife died on February 22nd, 1870. They were apparently a happy and much attached couple. They had no children, and since her death Wilson had continued to occupy the same rooms.

"And," added my informant, with a lurking smile, "I find that since he has been in London he held the post of confidential clerk to Mr. Maitland, solicitor, of Bedford Row."

"Thank you," said Mr. Maitland. "I am much obliged to you. It has been painful to me to institute these inquiries, but I was bound to set my mind at rest about Mr. Wilson."

Although I had gained little direct evidence, my suspicions gathered strength. Impossible as the idea seemed, the testimony of the handwriting proclaimed that James Wilson must in some way be connected with the perpetrator of the foul crime. At least, he would be able to identify the writer of the message. My agent had ascertained that his wife had died on February 22d, 1870—two days after the blow was struck. As I thought the matter over, the fact of Wilson not having mentioned his wife's death at the time, and his misleading words to me on a recent occasion, which had made me conclude he was unmarried, tended to make it appear possible that the writer of the warning note was Mrs. Wilson herself. Even the tremulous nature of the handwriting would be accounted for; as she must have been at that moment lying on her death-bed. How Roland Northwick became entangled with James Wilson's wife was a matter of little consequence now. Detective skill must unravel all that, and no doubt drag a painful scandal to light. For me, at present, it was sufficient to know that could I prove the writer of these two papers lying in my pocket to be James Wilson's wife, I had enough ground to justify his arrest as the murderer.

This identification must be my first task. I determined to make no delay. The thought that for years I had been in daily contact and communication with the cold-blooded murderer of one of my dearest friends was to me horrible. With this dreadful suspicion hanging over him, I felt it almost impossible to breath the same air with Wilson, much less to transact my usual business matters with him. I felt that I might betray myself in his presence, and, with the acute suspicion which such a crime must engender, he would guess what was passing through my mind, and fly from justice. I left the office, stating that I should not return that day, and the next morning sent Wilson a letter, saying that an urgent private matter had called me into the country. The link that joined the two others I must have before proceeding any further. I knew the name of the church in which Wilson had been married; the object of my journey was to visit it. I inspected the register of marriages, and, knowing the date of the ceremony, had but little difficulty in lighting on the signatures of Adelaide Fletcher and James Wilson. The resemblance in the writing here was even closer to the warning message than that of the lines of poetry I had so fortunately found. Perhaps, from the emotion natural to a young girl when signing her maiden name for the last time, the strokes were tremulous, even as from another cause they were tremulous in those fatal words that now lay side by side with the bride's signature—"My husband knows all. I couldn't help it Beware!"

With all my lingering doubts—with all the hopes I cherished as to Wilson's innocence dispelled, I hastened back to town, nerving myself to perform a harrowing duty the next day—the duty of denouncing as the murderer of Roland Northwick the man who for eight years had been my constant companion and trusted associate in business.

Late as the hour was when I reached Paddington, I drove straight to Inspector Sharpe's house. Accustomed to surprises at all hours, the astute gentleman expressed no astonishment at seeing me, but awaited patiently any communication I had to make for his benefit. Yet for once, at least, in the course of his checkered career I believe he was taken aback.

"If you will be at my office at eleven o'clock precisely to-morrow morning, I will point out to you the man who murdered Roland Northwick."

The inspector stared.

"Tell me where to find him," he said, "and the handcuffs shall be on his wrists to-night."

I hesitated. Something restrained me from telling him to whom my suspicions pointed. It was not mercy; but I wished to give Wilson one chance of explaining the thing which had led me to accuse him of the crime.

"No," I replied. "I cannot even tell you his name at this moment. I must manage matters in my own way. He will come to my office to-morrow, utterly unsuspecting. I will then point him out to you, and you can take the proper course."

Inspector Sharpe promised obedience to my instructions, so I left him to dream, no doubt, of the reward he might claim to-morrow.

Tired as I was with the day's work, I slept but little that night. I was drawing mental pictures of the painful proceeding of to-morrow. Then, between sleeping and waking, a wild thought took possession of me. I fancied that for some reason or other Wilson had divined my suspicions, and that on the morrow he would be absent. So strongly did this idea impress me, that I actually rose, determined to go to the detective at once, reveal all I knew, and let the arrest be made at once, so that justice should not be defeated. Then, as my senses returned to me, I saw how utterly impossible it was that Wilson could suspect anything, and, lying down once more, I resolved to let matters follow in the train I had designed.

Still it was not without relief I saw, upon entering my office in the morning, my confidential clerk at his usual post. He saluted me with his invariably calm politeness. For the life of me I could not return the greeting; but, averting my face, hurried into my room, the entrance to which lay through his. I opened my letters in a mechanical way, in the present excited state of my mind giving little heed to their contents. I could think only of one thing—was I not wrong, after all? Could that quiet, self-possessed, gentle-spoken man, now sitting within a few feet of me, be guilty of one of the foulest and most dastardly crimes ever perpetrated? I began now almost to wish that my fear of the preceeding night had been well founded, and his flight had given me assurance of his guilt.

In a few minutes the door of my office opened and Wilson entered. He had a number of papers in his hand, and running them through, said:

"If you are at liberty now, Mr. Maitland, there are several things about which I should like to consult you."

I shuddered as he spoke; but he stood there with his impassable exterior—his mind, evidently, bent only on business—it seemed absurd to suppose that this was the being who, with hellish vengeance in his heart, crept up the staircase to Roland's bedroom; that those white fingers, holding now a harmless pen, were the same which closed round the handle of the knife that pierced my poor friend's bosom.

But the time for hesitation and uncertainty was gone by. In an hour Sharpe would be here, eager for his prey; and until he came I determined that Mr. James Wilson should not be a moment out of my sight.

I rose and walked to the office door, locked it, and placed the key in my pocket. Then I resumed my seat; and motioned Wilson to one near me. My unusual proceedings, I fancied, troubled him—he turned a shade paler if that were possible, but he said nothing.

Many a time afterward, in cold blood, I have wondered at my folly at thus, of my own free will, cooping myself up with a man whom I suspected to be a murderer; a man who might have made preparations against a surprise of this nature, and to whom my life might be as nothing. But I was the stronger, although the older, man of the two. Wilson, although tall, was slim, almost to thinness, and I was certain that in a hand-to-hand struggle I could overpower him. I felt disgust and horror at my companion, but not fear. He looked at me inquiringly.

"Mr. Wilson," I said, "some time ago you led me to understand you were unmarried. I have since ascertained that your wife died in February, 1870."

Wilson, whose acuteness told him that I did not make this assertion with the primary object of reproaching him for concealing the true state of his domestic affairs from me, made a simple gesture of assent.

"I find," I continued, "that your wife died on the 22d of February—two days after the murder of Roland Northwick."

As I spoke the last words he knew what was coming—I could see it in the man's face.

"And," I concluded, 'from certain facts which have come to my knowledge, I have decided that you, even if you did not strike the blow yourself must know the murderer."

Wilson rose. He was perfectly calm, and speaking in his usual quiet voice, said:

"You must be mad, Mr. Maitland, to make such an accusation—against me, of all men in the world? Without troubling to deny it, I ask you, as a lawyer and a man of business, what possible motive could I have for committing such a crime?"

"The day before he was killed, Roland Northwick received a letter of warning from a woman—a woman whose husband he had doubtless wronged. Till a few days ago her name was unknown. Now, from the similarity of the curious writing to that of another specimen which I have ascertained was written by your wife, I know that the warning was sent by her. James Wilson, you wretched murderer! Your hour has come! I have already denounced you, and in a short time the officers will be here."

Wilson sat silent for some time. I was on the alert, expecting that my accusation would be the signal for an attempt to escape. But nothing seemed further from his thoughts. After a while he raised his eyes to mine, and said quietly.

"Your knowledge of common law cannot be very great, Mr. Maitland, if you think that any English jury will convict a man upon the fancied resemblance between two scraps of writing. But your deductions are better than your law—I did kill Roland Northwick."

The audacity of this full confession, spoken as if he were mentioning an incident in his career of little moment, so surprised me that I could only stare at him and ejaculate:

"Villain! Ruffian!"

"Yes," continued this strange man, "I killed him—I will tell you why I killed him—that is, if you care to listen to the tale, and if there is time before the warrant arrives."

"The information will be sworn at eleven o'clock," I stammered; marveling at his extraordinary composure, and by it compelled to give him an answer to his question. "Till then," I added, "I shall not lose sight of you for an instant."

He smiled faintly, almost contemptuously. He might really have been an uninterested spectator of the scene. He began to speak, and, in a moment, his whole manner changed. He was transfigured, and I knew that at last I was face to face with the true man. His brows contracted, his deep-set eyes burned with fierce light, his cheek flushed, and the veins on his forehead stood out with emotion. His speech was rapid, and his language eloquent. His gestulation was striking; his thin, lithe fingers clasped each other, or were extended to give due influence to his powerful words; and as I watched his actions and listened to his words, I comprehended that under the cold surface of reserve, under that well-fitting mask of suave politeness, beat a heart shaken by the strongest passions and capable of the deepest feeling. As I stood face to face with him, I could scarcely realize that this was the same man whom I had seen daily for eight years.

"I will be brief, Mr. Maitland," he said, "I killed Roland Northwick because he seduced my wife. I had loved her as a boy—I loved and married her as a man. If I had no wealth to give, I gave her such love as man has never yet given woman. I believed her to be the most pure, as well as the most beautiful, of women. To me she was simply my life. Every hope, every thought of mine was for her happiness. Oh, how I loved that woman! I loved her, worshipped her, trusted her, slaved for her! And that night when, stricken with the illness which she knew would be fatal, when I hung over her pillow and tended her with loving hands, she whispered that cursed confession to me, my life was at an end for ever. As, trembling at death, and the judgment she feared after that death, she sobbed out her shame to me, praying for my forgiveness, so that the God whom she dreaded might, perhaps, forgive her, then I laid my lips beside her ear and whispered:

"'When I have killed him, I will forgive you. Not till then.'

"Had you ever loved a woman as I loved her, you would pity even whilst condemning me for what you call the crime. I cared not which was to blame, the man or the woman; but I said, 'That man shall die.' The details of their intrigue were of little interest. They had first met outside this very office, where she would frequently wait to accompany me home. How their acquaintance ripened, or what arts he used, I know not. She was a beautiful woman, and he was a gallant handsome young man. Yet the day has been when I could have shown as gay and gallant a front as Mr. Roland Northwick! He had made an end of my life, and his own should pay forfeit.

"The next morning I was outside his house, but found no means of gaining an entrance, I knew all his habits well, and several times had been to his rooms on business.

"To-morrow," I whispered to my wife, who now lay almost speechless and insensible—and 'to-morrow' it was! You know the rest.

"I reached home in the evening, and leaning over my dying wife whispered:

"He is dead—I forgive you now."

"She spoke no more. The next day she died, and that look of horror which settled on her face when I whispered those words of forgiveness never left it."

He was silent.

"You wretched man!" I cried. "Do you feel no remorse?"

"I feel no remorse. My life became a blank. Love passed out of it with my wife's death. Hate left it when I drove that knife through her seducer's heart. Since then I have cared nothing for life—nothing for death."

"But the hereafter—beyond death!" I cried, appalled by such callousness.

Wilson had again seated himself, and resumed his usual mask. His recent excitement had vanished, and left no trace. His ordinary quiet smile passed over his features.

"Intellectual men with my views," he said, "trouble little about the future, and fear it less."

In spite of my horror and disgust, I could not help feeling a certain amount of curiosity.

"But how could you avoid detection?" I asked.

"Simply by not trying to escape it. I cared little whether I was discovered or not. Some strange instinct induced me to take the watch and chain, which now lies a shapeless mass, buried in one corner of the cellar beneath this house. I only wanted access to the room. Having done what I had resolved to do, it mattered little whether I came out again or not. By some strange chance no one saw me; so I walked down the stairs and reached the office as usual. My glove was on my hand when I struck the blow. It was stained with blood, so I burnt it. That was all. Had I been arrested that day—as, indeed, I fully expected to have been—I should have made no defense paying the penalty of my act as carelessly as I shall now."

"But how could you meet me? How could you go about your business as usual, with this awful crime on your conscience?"

"I tell you, Mr. Maitland, I neither felt nor feel remorse regret, or even wish to evade justice. My life, as I understand life, ended. I simply waited, never doubting but all would some day be known."

I felt it was too horrible to hear this man discussing his crime and approaching a shameful end as coolly as though he were speaking of some client's ordinary business matters.

"Now you see, Mr. Maitland," he continued, "why I refused your kind offer of a partnership. It will matter very little your clerk being arrested for murder; but had I been your partner it would not have improved the standing of your firm."

I thanked him mentally for his consideration, but said nothing. I was determined to speak no more. It was too painful, and I longed for Sharpe to arrive and terminate the interview.

Wilson, as though reading my thoughts, glanced at his watch.

"I see that my time is short," he said. "I have one letter I wish to write before the handcuffs are on my wrists. Would it be asking too great a favor if I requested you to leave me alone for a few minutes?"

I told him he was at liberty to write what he liked; but I should not quit him. He slightly shrugged his shoulders, and saying, "As you will," took a sheet of paper and commenced writing.

His letter was a very short one. He placed it in an envelope, laying it on the table with the address downward.

The minutes stole on, surely it must now be eleven o'clock. I would have looked at my watch, but a kind of feeling of delicacy restrained me. I waited some time longer and then glanced at Wilson. I was sitting nearest the door, with the idea of cutting off any attempted escape. Wilson was in my usual seat at the table which was littered with letters and legal documents. This table, I should add, was between us. As he finished his letter he took up a brief and commenced perusing it. Even at this awful moment he appeared to be interested only in the work which had done so well for so many years. His left hand held the sheet he was perusing near his eyes; the remainder of the document hung down, hiding his right hand as well as the greater portion of his body. As I sat waiting until the hour sounded from the neighboring church tower, and wondering at the self-command displayed by the remorseless murderer, he looked across and met my gaze. There was an expression in his eyes, which I had never before noticed there.

"I have been thinking, Mr. Maitland," he said in his gentle voice, "that, after all, I should like to escape the gallows. As there are only two ways of escaping—one over your body, and another—I choose that other one."

And before I could comprehend the hidden meaning of his words I heard the loud report of a pistol, and James Wilson fell forward across my office-table, deluging it and all it held with his heart's blood.

Before I could call for assistance, Inspector Sharpe, who was waiting outside, burst open the door and rushed to the dying man. He sighed once, and then we knew that all was over with him.

The letter he had just penned was addressed to me. It contained only these words:

"The reason of my rash act is extensive defalcations, which, sooner or later, you must discover."

At the inquest held on my ill-fated clerk I had to appear. I stated truthfully that our conversation that morning had been upon a matter of business which conducted much to my astonishment, the letter which I produced apparently explained all. The verdict was, "Suicide in an unsound state of mind."

I never looked for any defalcations, knowing that none would be found. The detective, no doubt, formed his own conclusions as to the identity of the man he was to arrest, for he asked me no questions about him; but I—and I only—knew the whole truth: why Roland Northwick was murdered, and why James Wilson had killed himself in my office. And this truthful narrative above written.

THE END.

European Cavalry.

Among the military nations of the Continent it is recognized that, so far from the time for the efficacious employment of cavalry either on the battlefield or in enterprises against the flanks or rear of an army being past, a glorious future is dawning for that arm, and that opportunities will arise when well disciplined, well-trained, well-commanded cavalry may, through the power of securing for itself comparative immunity from the dangers to which other arms are in a higher degree exposed, take a leading part in the conflict and principally decide the fate of a campaign. Among the high authorities, Field-Marshal Count Moltke has recorded his opinion that because in future the destructive fire of infantry will necessitate a scattered formation the role of cavalry will be most important. Greater skill will no doubt be required in handling it so as to bring it into action decisively at the critical moment, cito, celeriter victoriam, for only by rapidity in manoeuvring can the effect of the breechloader be paralyzed. History proves that when a cavalry a victory is rarely brilliant. If cavalry is beaten, according to Montecuculi, the battle is entirely lost; if, on the other hand, it is victorious, the victory is complete. From the day when Hannibal destroyed the Roman host at Cannæ to that on which, 2 000 years afterward, the British squadrons, charging the flank of the old guard at Waterloo, "prevented rallying" after the annihilation of the French cavalry, this axiom has been verified on several occasions nobly executed in order to gain time for the infantry, by heroic effort to avert disasters already imparable, but neither in the "death ride" of Worth or Rejonville, or in the terrible slaughter of Sedan, were the losses as great as those incurred by cavalry in the days of muzzle-loaders. That the effect of the shock of modern weapons, requiring as they do for their use considerable skill and a correct judgment of distance, would be very destructive to cavalry moving rapidly over the zone of 400 yards remains to be proved. In a trial which took place in India between 4 Gardner guns and a detachment of picked shots file-firing at 6 stationary targets at 585 yards, the distance being known, the latter made only 24 hits with 411 rounds, and at 900 yards volley-firing the distance being known, only 36 hits out of 630 rounds. The Gardner guns were even less successful, a result highly encouraging to cavalry.—[The Fortnightly Review.

A Little Virginia Girl.

Joaquin Miller, the poet and novelist, has been down in the West Virginia mountains and he writes to the New York Star:

"A little Virginian climbed up the tree like a little pet squirrel; she was as frisky; her hair as black, bushy and abundant; her eyes as bright and many times as large and beautiful. Ah, me! my heart went all to pieces at once. She was about a dozen years old, and yet she was a woman. But she didn't know it at all; she had no dream of such a thing. And that fact alone made her so ten-fold formidable. I helped her my seat in the packed car, and she thanked me with such prompt ease and grace, such precision of silent, good will that I wanted to stand there before her and wait all the days of my life for her to speak. But she never spoke. Her hair was all tumbled about, her dress was torn, and her small, dimpled hands were brown as a briar-root. Pretty soon she dived her little hand into her pocket, threw back her hair with the right hand, and so began to crack a lot of chestnuts with the white teeth and the reddest lips you ever looked at. Dear, lovely little girl. She was the quaintest bit of nature I have seen in the state of Oregon. And although I shall never see her again I venture my life that she will have the best blood in the land, one of the first families of the war; a pitiful little waif whose valiant people went down in defeat and never came back to her mother and her mother's mother any more. And what a contrast her wild refinement with the beginnings of vulgarity in lace and diamonds one encountered in New York I again fell thinking, and thinking of the strange vicissitudes of life in this up and down world of ours."

The Russians are reducing their army expenditure by $4,500,000 per annum. According to the Moscow Gazette, this economy is to be brought about by extending the time of service and decreasing the annual number of recruits. Instead of the 260,000 recruits serving respectively three years for infantry and four years for cavalry, it was decided at the last meeting of the committee charged with the consideration of the subject: 1. An idea of the consumption of ice in Great Britain may be formed from the fact that Boston alone, since the beginning of the year, upwards of fifty thousand tons of ice from Sweden and Norway were imported in 116 steamers and sailing vessels. Freights even marks a ton, the price has latterly risen to twenty-four marks, and is likely to be still higher, in consequence whereof the manufacture of artificial ice is attracting much attention.

The islands of Mauritius and Reunion, in the Indian Ocean, which are 115 miles apart, are to have telegraphic communication with each other by means of signals flashed from the mountain tops. The instrument adopted for the purpose is the heliotrope, a small mirror which is used in trigonometrical surveying. The population of the two islands is 400,000, and, as Mauritius is about being connected by cable with all parts of Europe and Asia, the heliotrope will include Reunion in the system. The sun telegraph, which has already been tested, will be useful in transmitting intelligence from one island to the other of the approach of cyclones, which are common and very destructive there.

One of the industries of thrifty France is the making of wine from raisins, which is carried on especially at Marseilles, Cette, Bordeaux, and Bercy. About seventy thousand tons of raisins are imported in France from the neighboring high country and Syria, costing nearly $7,500,000. After softening into water, and the addition of sugar and alcohol, a harmless wine is produced, of which no less than thirty millions hectoliters are made. Another dodge is to treat the settlings, the residuum of the native harvests of Spain, Portugal, Sicily, etc., with sugar, alcohol, and water, and make from the compound what is called "second vat" wines. Thus France, in spite of phylloxera, retains her position as the greatest wine-exporting country in the world.

An improved electric railway about two miles long, and 39 inches gauge is now in operation between the cities of Frankfort and Offenbach, the time being about ten minutes. The four dynamo-electric machines are driven by two steam engines of 125 horse power each. In connection with the cables which conduct the current of electricity, a switch is provided to regulate and direct it. The conductors consist of tubes slitted along their entire length at the bottom and insulated on poles like telegraph wires. A small cylinder slides or runs in the tubes, and from this a conductor connects the car and the dynamo. The use of this conductor prevents interruptions at the cut-outs, which are caused by frosts and moisture when the carriage runs on a conductor, as in the Berlin-Lichterfelde Electric Railway.

This total included 166 paintings, 23 pieces of sculpture, 9 architectural drawings, 4 engravings, as against 906 paintings, 263 water color-drawings, 169 pieces of sculpture, 135 architectural drawings, 47 miniatures and enamels, 58 crayon drawings, and 97 engravings, all from the hands of non-members of the Royal Academy.

One of the industries of thrifty France is the making of wine from raisins, which is carried on especially at Marseilles, Cette, Bordeaux, and Bercy. About seventy thousand tons of raisins are imported into France from the neighboring high countries and Syria, costing nearly $7,500,000. By softening into water, and the addition of sugar and alcohol, a harmless wine is produced, of which no less than three million hectoliters are made. Another dodge is to treat the settlings, the residuum of the native harvests of Spain, Portugal, Sicily, etc., with sugar, alcohol, and water, and make from the compound what is called "second vat" wines. Thus France, in spite of phylloxera, retains her position as the greatest wine-exporting country in the world.

An improved electric railway about 4½ miles long, and 39 inches gauge is now in operation between the cities of Frankfort and Offenbach, the time being about 25 minutes. The four dynamo-electric machines are driven by two steam engines of 125 horse-power each. In connection with the cables which conduct the current of electricity, a switch is provided to regulate and direct it. The conductors consist of tubes slitted along their entire length at the bottom and insulated on poles like telegraph wires. A small cylinder slides or runs in the tubes, and from this a conductor connects the car and the dynamo. The use of this conductor prevents interruptions and cut-outs, which are caused by frosts and moisture when the carriage runs on a conductor, as in the Berlin-Lichterfelde Electric Railway.

Great excitement was caused a few days ago on the Thames enbankment by the chase of a porpoise up the river by men armed with rifles on board a steam-tug. The porpoise was a large and lively specimen, and gave his pursuers some trouble. He was three times fired at near Westminster bridge, the last shot evidently taking effect, as he gave a tremendous leap under one of the arches on the Lambeth side and then disappeared in deep water, the ebb running down very rapidly at the time. Only a day or two previous a porpoise was seen beyond Chelsea bridge, and several have lately been seen within the mouth of the river. A female porpoise, in fine condition, measuring four feet six inches, weight fifty-six pounds, was caught the day before off Sufferance and Providence wharves, Belvedere road, by a lighterman, who succeeded in hooking it with his kitcher.

The Russians are reducing their army expenditure by $4,500,000 per annum. According to the Moscow Gazette, this economy is to be brought about by extending the time of service and decreasing the annual number of recruits. Instead of the 260,000 recruits serving respectively three years for infantry and four years for cavalry, it was decided at the last meeting of the commission charged with the consideration of the subject: 1. To reduce the Caucasian regiments and the whole reserve forces in times of peace so as to diminish the standing army by 100 000 men. 2. To fix the period of service at five years for infantry and artillery and six years for cavalry. 3. To settle the annual contingent of recruits at 190,000 men serving a period of from five to six years, and at 44,000 men serving for nine months, which will diminish the annual levy of recruits by 25 000 men. If the annual cost of a recruit, is put at $45, this reduction will save more than $4.500,000 per annum.

The Italian government has recently published some figures on the subject of public instruction in Italy. The budget of public instruction has risen from 16 300,000 francs in 1871 to 130,400,000 francs in 1883; the number of schools from 21,358 in 1811 to 42,510 in 1881; and the number of pupils in the same period from 1,008,674 to 1,928,700. There are, moreover, 701 gymnasiums or secondary schools with 3,674 professors and 41,124 scholers, and having a five years' course of study. Above the gymnasiums, agaid, are colleges to the number of 298, with 1,601 professors and 11,133 students, and a course of study lasting three years. In addition, there are 383 technical schools, with an attendance of 22,120. Lately, the Royal universities, 18 in number, registered in 1881 10,592 students, the two most important being those of Turin with 1.651 students, and Naples with 2,851 students. There have still to be added 21 high schools indpendent universities, instructingal and together 1,948 scholars.

This year's vintages in France are likely to be of quite exceptional excellence. A good vintage, however, does not, unfortunately, mean what it once did, the ravages of phylloxera during the past sixteen years having so largely diminished the number of vines. A few figures will show what havoc has been made by this scourage of French vinelands. Fourteen years ago there were 2,400,000 hectares of vineyards, and now there are scarcely 1,000,000 under cultivation. The production has fallen within the same period from 72 000,000 to 30,000,000 of hectolitres. Not only has exportation become immensely reduced, but importation has to be resorted to for the supply of this country. Within only the last four years wines have been brought into the country from Spain, Italy, and Greece to the value of 1,000,000 francs. Of the 1,500 000 hectares devastated, not more than 20,000 hectares have as yet be replanted which is not to be wondered at, considering that it costs as much to replant as the soil itself is worth.

A Human Skye Terrier.

The passenger who attracted the most attention during the voyage of the City of Chicago from Liverpool to New York was Theodore Jo Jo, a boy of 16, whose face resembles that of a Skye terrier. His face is covered with a long waivy mass of silken hair, which in color is between light red and silver gray. It hangs upon his brow down to his eyes, parting in the centre and waiving off to either side like that of a fancy terrier. It droops from his cheeks in long wavy locks, grows from the nostrils, and hangs from both ears. The length of this luxuriant growth of hair varies from two to four inches, and it is so thick that the skin beneath is visible only in scattered spots. The eyes of this dog-faced boy also resemble very closely those of a terrier. They are slightly bluish in color, almost perfectly round, and the whites are visible entirely around the pupils His mouth is furnished with only the two canine teeth above and two incisors below, and all four are thin and sharp, resembling miniature tusks rather than human teeth. The entire body is covered with a growth of thin, light hair, but the thick heavy locks are found only on the face. He speaks Russian and German tolerably well, and a few words of English and took great pride in showing that he could write his name by signing it to the back of his pictures in large, flowing characters. The dog-faced boy was captured in the forests of Kostroma, in the center of Russia, about eleven years ago, with his father, who is described as a wild man, with the same peculiar face which the boy now possesses. Jo Jo was then little more than a baby, and his face was comparatively hairless. The father was exhibed all over Europe until three years ago, when he died. —New York Times.

Alaska Devil Fish.

Victor Hugo's description of the devil fish has always had for me a terrible fascination, but here in Alaska, this land of wonders, the Indians recount stories equally startling, and almost all of them substantially corroborated by good testimony. Yesterday an Indian hooked up from one of the wharf posts an octopus five feet from tip to tip, and to the query "What are you going to do with him?" answered: "Me eat him," and in fact with them the flesh is esteemed a great delicacy, although when alive the animal is an object of terror. The flesh when boiled is perfectly white, and tastes something like cods' tongues, but while eating it the recollection of what the dainty was when alive takes away all enjoyment. It is not such a harmless amusement this fishing for devil-fish, and one which everybody would choose for an afternoon sport. There is only one really skilful fisher in town, a mission boy, who fearlessly wades into the water near their haunts, and, seeing the animal, tears him from the rock. Of course his satanic majesty resents the intrusion upon his rights and retaliates by winding one or more arms around the limbs of the boy, but with a quick and peculiar motion the Indian tears them off with a noise resembling the ripping of heavy cotton cloth, at the same time slitting open the sack of the animal. It is a dangerous proceeding, and one which makes the beholder cringe to see the soft slimy arm of the octopus winding itself around and gradually taking hold with its innumerable suckers, surely and gradually drawing its victim down. Only on one occasion, historically speaking, has one of these creatures been found of sufficient size to attack a canoe and one Indian was the only survivor.

Increase of Wealth.

An English statistician maintains that the daily increase of wealth in the United States is upward of $25,000,000, or about $838,000,000 a year, which is one-third as much as the increase in wealth as the whole of the rest of the world. England, whose increase of wealth is next to our own, makes only a profit on all her business of $300,000,000 a year, or but a little over a third of our own.

FALLING A MILE.

A Startling Adventure in a Balloon—Dropping Like a Shot From the Clouds to the Earth.

Monday a startling experience of Messrs. Gaston Tissandier and Friederick Gower, husband of Nordica, the American prima donna, showed that the practical dangers of ballooning are still far from being surmounted, however well actual disasters may be avoided by coolness and skill. These two gentlemen ascended from the Tissandier establishment at Auteuil about 1 o'clock, to continue a series of scientific experiments upon certain theories advanced by M. Gower. They sailed slowly past Paris to the southeast at a height of about 1,500 feet, and disappeared in the direction of Vincennes. In answer to the inquiry of a Morning News representative M. Gower relates what befell the voyagers afterwards.

"We were at a height of six thousand feet above the village of Fontenay. A fete was going on there, and the faint echo of drums, mingled with the cries of children and the barking of dogs, just reached our ears amid the awful silence of the heavens. We were among the clouds of the lower heavens. We were among the clouds of the lower stratum, and had before our eyes the magnificent spectacle of their formation. The forces of nature moved them to and fro in a kind of sullen majesty, now piling them into a mountain just above our heads, and, then, as the mass toppled to its fall, dispersing it suddenly, as by a blow from the hammer of some invisible Titan, making rifts through which we saw the fair, green lands, and quickly closing them, as the vaporous monster rolled into fresh combinations. It was the inner temple of creative power, perhaps the greatest sight revealed to human eyes, and we stood entranced in silent admiration.

"Suddenly we felt a breath of cold and biting air, as though the world had revolved beneath us and brought us over the pole. At the same moment the needle upon a verticle scale (from which I had been reading indications of level) began to travel with a startling speed. A sound like the roar of surf filled our ears for an instant and then gave place to the noise of the fete, which had now swelled into a cry, as it seemed, from every living thing below. Tissandier threw out sand, and the sand flew up in our faces. Our breath came short and hard, and we felt the rushing air as on a steamer against the wind. We were falling suddenly, as though the great globe above our heads had given way! Yet nothing visible had happened, save that the undersurface of the envelope had all at once grown hollow and wrinkled, like the face of an aged man. The clouds were gone as by magic, and the earth was rushing at us, with its thousand voices in full cry. Tissandier stood cool and firm, dealing out the ballast with steady hand and counting the bags that remained.

"'Stand by the anchor,' he said, quietly, as if at his study table, 'and be ready to cut away when I tell you.'

"Down we went; the drag-rope touched the earth—trailed across the fields, with scarcely perceptible difference in our fall. The ground seemed alive with men hurrying from every side, with here and there a horseman among them. A meadow was just beneath, and a quick glance beyond showed the edge of a forest. The balloon trembled as from a blow, and our speed across the field was suddenly doubled. We had fallen into a squall.

"'Cut away,' said the steady voice of the aeronaut, and the anchor fell. Over went a bag of ballast, too, and, thus suddenly lightening by thirty pounds, the balloon regained its poise at fifty feet above the ground, and our fall of a mile through the air was safely ended.

"Never was sound precept more quickly followed by practical illustration. Less than an hour before Tissandier had been dwelling on the need of reserving ballast as a precaution. 'There are in the air,' said he, 'occasional rarefactions into which a balloon can fall without the slightest warning. When you are near the ground it does not much matter. But no prudent aeronant at a height of a thousand meters or more will allow his ballast to become even nearly exhausted.' And this was precisely what our own case showed so shortly afterward. We encountered a partial vacuum, a veritable pit in the air, where the lifted power of gas suddenly fell to almost nothing. Air was, of course, on the way from some area of a greater density to restore the normal pressure, and of this we had ample evidence upon reaching the ground. The anchor struck the soft earth in the most favourable position, buried half its flukes in the soil, and was snatched out with scarcely an effort by the flying car. Again and again the heavy iron bounded fifty feet into the air, and it was only when a score of stout laborers had laid hold of the drag-rope (at cost of a few tumbles), that the gambols of our playful monster were brought to an end. And then Tissandier, while obliging hands folded and packed the balloon, produced a notebook and his map, and calmly completed his record of the excursion."—[Paris News.

A Tale for the Marines.

The sudden change in the weather reminded the young woman of her sealskin sacque packed away up-stairs.

She brought it down and showed it to her father.

"It looks a little worn and shabby, my dear," said the old gentleman; "I will give you the money to get a new one before cold weather sets in."

"Oh, no, you needn't, papa. A little cleaning and brushing and it can be made to look very well for another season at least."

She then went into the kitchen and made some biscuits for tea that reminded the writer of swansdown, only they weren't quite so heavy.

The name and address of this girl will be given to any young man whose references are satisfactory.

Paying for Value Received.

"How much did Mr. Smith give you at his wedding?" asked a minister's wife of her husband.

"Two dollars."

"Well, that's a very insignificant sum for a rich man like Mr. Smith to pay for such a service."

"It does seem a small amount," he replied, "but you must remember that he has been married before."

Killed for a Bear.

Bobcaygeon, Nov. 1.—A sad accident occurred Wednesday in Somerville at a place known as Bolton's crossing on the Victoria railway. Robert English was out hunting and was looking for a bear. At the same time an Indian named Spaniard was also out hunting dressed in a black coat. He had set some traps, and was stooping over one of them when Mr. English came through the woods. Seeing something black through the brush wood he levelled his rifle and fired. The ball entered Spaniard's side and came out near the shoulder. He gave one cry and fell to the ground and died in about forty minutes.—World.

The Decadence of Marriage.

The Detroit Post recently discussed in a very sensible way the question of the decadence of marriage. The writer took it for granted as a fact almost too patent to require proof, that there is such a decadence. There is a disinclination, if not a positive aversion to assuming the marriage relation, he thinks, which is a new feature in social life. This more especially on the part of men. With women the case is different. Even if she have no great inclination for marriage, she does not openly express herself as the man does. As to the causes the writer thinks there is little real question. One of the foremost is the changed view of what is necessary to make a happy married life. Young people are not contented to begin as their parents began. They want the same comfortable style of living they have always been accustomed to, and they hesitate to enter a condition of life which may necessitate the sacrifice of any of this. The first step, then, is the acquisition by the young man of means sufficient to keep up a certain amount of style, and this sometimes requires so long a time that he loses all inclination to give up the freedom as a bachelor.

A NEW CARTAGE COMPANY.—To-day the Dominion Transfer Company begins operations in this city as cartage agents of the Canadian Pacific. The company is already doing business in Montreal, and will open out at all the main stations of the road. They will take over a portion of the plant of Rosser & Co., who have heretofore done the cartage business of the Ontario and Quebec in Toronto. The president of the company, Mr. Vassalis, the superintendent, Mr. Smith, all of Montreal, were in town yesterday completing arrangements.

Triples While in Her Teens.

San Antonio, Tex., Nov. 3.—Marie Cusimano, an Italian emigrant yet in her teens, gave birth to triplets on the train arriving here yesterday. She had with her three other children born a year ago.

A punkin which was left in an Ohio newspaper office by an honest looking farmer exploded within half an hour he left and almost destroyed the office. Over 150,000 seeds have been combed out of the editor's hair, and the outlook is still promising.

There are women who will spend lavishly for show and screw down the wages of servants and work-people to the lowest possible point, who will be affable and courteous in the parlor and rude or unfeeling in the kitchen or nursery. The type of character which can thus oppress or insult those who have no means of redress, and from there is no hope of gain or fear of loss, is essentially mean, dishonorable, and low.

To overcome evil with good is the most glorious of all virtues; it is the most beneficial also, because this amiable conduct alone can put an end to an eternal succession of injuries and retaliation—for every retaliation becomes a new injury, and requires another act of revenge for satisfaction. Would we thus observe this salutory precept—to love our enemies and to do good to those who despitefully use us—this obstinate benevolence would at last conquer the most inveterate hearts, and we should have no enemies to forgive.

A project which has been talked about for a good many years among some of the leading Presbyterians of Canada, seems likely at length to crystallize into something like definite shape. It is proposed to form a joint-stock company and start a newspaper which shall be much more truly representative of wealth and intelligence of that powerful church, than the journal which at present figures as its organ. Much dissatisfaction, it is said, is felt with the Canadian Presbyterian. No enthusiasm is felt for it in any part of the denomination. Many of the ministers feel very coldly towards it, and express themselves unable conscientiously to urge their people to take it. On the whole there seems good reasons to believe that a newspaper, once started, and edited with the ability the Presbyterian Church ought to be well able to supply, would have no reason to complain of lack of support. Such a body as the Presbyterians, which includes such a large proportion of the wealth and intelligence of the Province, ought to support a denominational paper second to none on this continent.

My customers will please not leave their hair cutting until Saturday as that is my busy day. T. D. SMITH, Markdale.

NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER VII.

Until long after midnight aunt Annette, Mr. Benson, and I sat discussing this—to me—momentous matter. One thing was certain—there was no deception, no flaw in the evidence no informality in the marriage; everything was perfectly straightforward and strictly legal. Aunt Annette wanted me to dispute the claim—possession was nine points of the law, she contended. But Mr. Benson declared that it would be absolutely useless—nay, he added gravely that it would be wrong to contest a claim so fully established. There was not the least doubt about any of the facts, and the case as strong as it well could be. Indeed Mr. Benson, who was an upright man as well as a clever lawyer, pointed out that, even if there should be a slight flaw in any of the evidence, that would not alter the fact that Paul's son was entitled to succeed him. Womanlike I was most curious to know why he did not like Lady Jesmond; but to this question he would give me no satisfactory answer. She was beautiful, graceful, well-bred.

"She gives me the idea of one who has been brought up in France," he said. "And, entre nous, Miss Gordon, I do not like French training."

Then came the question, what was to be done with me? What course ought I to pursue with regard to my future? Aunt Annette, who was vexed and angry at this untoward appearance of a claimant for my throne, declared that I should go back with her to the little house we had left but a few months before. But that had been let just as it stood, therefore we could not return to it for a time at least. Mr. Benson counselled us to wait.

"Wait until you see her, Miss Gordon, until you know what she intends to do. You have many undertakings on hand; she may desire to go on with some of them, and ask your co-operation. Be patient and wait."

When I retired to rest that night, sleep came not to my weary eyes, for my mind was full of the romance of this beautiful young widow who was coming to Jesmond Dene to reign in my stead. As a matter of course, I felt most bitterly and keenly the loss of this my princely inheritance. It was as much lost to me on that first evening when I heard the news as afterwards when others reigned there supreme. Crushing and keen was the ever-recurring thought that I was no longer "queen and mother" of my people; they were no longer my loyal and affectionate subjects I thought of the half built almshouses, of the hospitals and schools, of the thousand and one plans I had conceived for the benefit of those living around me, and my heart ached at the thought that my dreams would not be realized. Still, if the goodness of her heart were in accord with her personal charms, the probabilities were that Lady Jesmond would be pleased with the work I had begun and carry it on. What a dream of wealth and luxury, benevolence and happiness it had been to me! And now I must go back to the dreary seclusion that had been mine before.

But no! Now that love had dawned in my soul, the dreariness of my past life could never recur. I knew by instinct that Lady Saxon would love me none the less for my loss of fortune—that she would be superior to such sordid meanness as to allow her feelings towards me to change because I was no longer mistress of Jesmond Dene. And I was equally certain that Lord Saxon, than whom a more generous hearted man never lived, would love me as hitherto. My heart found perfect rest in these pleasant thoughts.

Early on the following morning my aunt Annette fell ill, and Lady Saxon came over to see me. I looked full and straight into my old friend's kindly face while I told my story. If I had detected the slightest coldness towards me, the slightest shade of disappointment, I should have shrunk from her. But there was nothing but the most loving sympathy and motherly affection depicted on her countenance. She listened for some time in silent amazement; and then she spoke.

"Felicia," she said, "you shall share my home and my purse; you shall be my dear adopted daughter, and I will make you so happy that you shall not miss Jesmond Dene. I love you the better now that I see how bravely and how well you can bear such a disastrous stroke of ill fortune I wonder what this Lady Jesmond is like?"

"Beautiful as a dream, I am told," I answered.

"A worshipper of beauty, a dreamer of dreams." The words returned to me with vivid force. They were Lady Saxon's description of her son.

How kind and good she was to me at this trying period of my life! I ought even to have been grateful for the misfortune which brought to me such disinterested love. She would have been pleased and proud to carry me off there and then. but I was destined to remain for many a long day at Jesmond Dene. I knew little of the world, my experience being limited to the few acquaintances of my aunt and Lady Saxon's; but I knew enough to be sure that it was a marvellous thing to find one perfectly disinterested friend.

"I think," said Mr. Benson, "that it would be as well to send a carriage to Honton station to meet Lady Jesmond. I do not know the hour at which she will arrive, but she said she should come to day."

"She will doubtless feel nervous," I remarked, "and slightly uncomfortable. It is not a very pleasant position for her."

Mr. Benson looked at me with his eyes opened to their widest extent.

"I saw no sign of nervousness in her," he observed. "She seemed perfectly self possessed and mistress of the situation."

The words jarred upon me.

"You must feel the position a painful one," he added kindly.

"But she is said to be as good as she is beautiful," I cried; "and good women are sensitive."

"Not all," he rejoined. "Many women have the most matter of fact natures; they are sensitive neither for themselves nor for others; yet they are good women."

"I think sensitiveness a noble virtue," I remarked.

"It is hardly that," he replied. "It is rather a quality that directs many others. Lady Jesmond is not sensitive, I am sure," Mr. Benson went on. "She did not seem to think how this change would affect any one but herself. You will send the carriage for her, bye the-bye?"

I did send it, with orders that it was to remain at the railway station and await all the London trains. I sent also for the doctor from Honton to see my aunt Annette. On his arrival he spoke rather gravely of her condition. I told him that she desired to go away from Jesmond Dene at once; but he said she would imperil her life if she were so rash. So perforce, whether we liked it or not, we must remain as guests within the walls of what had for a brief period been our own home."

"Forgive me, Miss Gordon," the doctor said before leaving; "but as I came along I heard a rumor which I venture most earnestly to hope is not true?"

I knew at once that the story in some way or other had leaked out.

"You mean," I said slowly, "that we have had news from India, and that my cousin Paul has left both a widow and a son?"

"That is what I heard. Is it true, Miss Gordon?" asked Doctor Bland.

"It is perfectly true," I replied. We expect the young widow, Lady Jesmond, and her son here to day."

"True? I did not believe it. There will be a revolution among the people, for you are greatly beloved here, Miss Gordon."

"Right is right," I answered; "and my cousin's little son is the heir to Jesmond Dene."

He said no more, but when he was gone I sought Mr. Benson and told him what had occurred, and that I thought it would be preferable to call all the servants together and tell them what had happened rather than that they should be left to hear it piecemeal from strangers. He quite agreed with me, and the whole household was gathered together in the servants' hall, where Mr. Benson told them the story of Paul's marriage and death, and announced that the widowed Lady Jesmond, with her little son Sir Guy, was coming that day to take possession. Mr. Benson told me, with tears in his eyes that when he had finished his narration there was but one cry among the servants, and that was for Miss Gordon. They all loved Miss Gordon; they did not want to lose Miss Gordon.

"They are devotedly attached to you," he said; and my heart was comforted by the knowledge that I retained the affection of those about me.

Noon came, but still there was no sound of carriage wheels. Then followed a long sultry afternoon, during which Mr. Benson, who was miserably anxious and nervous, dropped off to sleep.

That afternoon many callers came, for the news had spread throughout the district. I ought to have been, and I was, consoled by the many expressions of kindness and sympathy. No one seemed to think it strange that Paul had married, or that his widow should come home to claim his heritage. The general impression seemed to be that it was a thousand pities Sir William and his son had not been on better terms, when Captain Jesmond would have had no reason to conceal his marriage, and the unfortunate mistake would never have been made.

The long afternoon had passed, my visitors had all departed, and Mr. Benson had awaked from his slumbers; still there was no sound of carriage wheels to herald the approach of Lady Jesmond.

"I cannot stand much more of this kind of thing," said the lawyer. "I do not think I ever knew what suspense meant before."

"I have ordered dinner for seven," I said. And just as I uttered the words we heard the sound, so long and anxiously awaited, of carriage wheels. "They are here!" I cried.

But no warning came to me of what was to follow in the wake of the home coming of Lady Jesmond.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Shall you go to meet Lady Jesmond?" asked Mr. Benson.

"Yes," I replied; "she shall have a kindly welcome home."

I went out into the entrance hall, and there I saw three figures. One was that of a tiny child crying with fatigue; the second was a tall elderly woman dressed in deep mourning, who seemed to be a nurse; and the third a tall graceful lady dressed in deep black crape. This was the young widow, Lady Jesmond. I went to her with outstretched hands—for was she not Paul's widow?—but she did not or would not see them; for she merely gave me a cool little nod, and said—

"Are you Felicia Gordon?"

"Yes," I answered.

"Mr. Benson told me about you," she said. "Is he here? I am Lady Jesmond."

"Mr. Benson is here," I replied, "and has been anxiously expecting you."

"I hope," she said, "that we will be in time for dinner; I am very hungry. It has been a tiresome journey."

I had had some faint idea of falling on her neck and bidding her welcome to the home that I was about to relinquish to her—some faint idea of telling her how I bade her welcome for Paul's sake; but the manner in which she met my advances checked my ardor. It was evident the lady felt no emotion on reaching the home of her husband's boyhood. She was hungry!

"Dinner is at seven," I answered; and she must have noticed the change in my voice, for she looked at me.

"Seven!" she repeated. "Why, it is only just six now!"

Then I turned from her, and Heaven knows, although he had deprived me of my inheritance, tears of honest affection filled my eyes when I saw Paul's little son. I should have known the child was Paul's, no matter where I had seen him, his face was so like his father's. He had the same dark laughing eyes, with a golden light in their depths, the same brows, the same dark curls."

"Why," I cried, "this child is the living image of dear Paul!"

Lady Jesmond turned to me quickly, and there was a strange inflection in her voice.

"Did you know Paul?" she asked.

"I knew him well when he was a boy," I answered. "I knew him here at Jesmond Dene. I was his cousin."

"Yes, I know that—Mr. Benson told me; but I was not aware that you knew him," she remarked. Then her voice softened a little as she said, "I shall like to talk to you about him."

When she uttered these words, the bright handsome face of my dead cousin rose before me, and seemed to ask pleadingly for kindness to his wife. She should receive it from me for the sake of the olden days.

I took the bonny little fellow into my arms and caressed him fondly. He ceased crying, and looked with piteous eyes into my face.

'Mamma," he cried, "mamma!"

"I am here, Guy," replied Lady Jesmond quickly. "Be a good boy, dear."

"He is tired," I said. Shall I take him to the nursery we have prepared for him? It is the same his father had."

I saw her make a quick gesture to the woman who stood near. She came forward instantly.

"I am the child's nurse," she said, and prepared to take him from me; but the little fellow resisted all her efforts and clasped his baby arms tightly round my neck.

"Never mind, nurse," interposed Lady Jesmond. "If Miss Gordon likes to trouble herself with a tiresome child; let her; I am sure it is very kind of her. Guy must be good," she added, turning to the little fellow who still clung eagerly to me.

The sound of her voice sweet and musical as it was, did not seem to appease the child. Again in a piteous voice he cried—

"Mamma!"

"I am here," Lady Jesmond repeated. "You had better take him, nurse; he seems inclined to be cross. I have but little patience with crying children," she continued. Then, turning to me, she asked. "Have you?"

"Unfortunately for me, I have been but little with children," I said; "but I do not think my patience would fail."

"Shall I take Sir Guy now, and give him his bath, my lady?" asked the nurse. "Then I can come and help your ladyship to dress."

"See that you have all you want yourself: nurse. Ring for wine or tea, and see that you have every comfort," said Lady Jesmond, much to my astonishment.

I thought that speech showed decided consideration for others, and it pleased me.

The child continued to cry as he was carried off to the nursery, and the sound was strange in that old house, where children had not lived for so many years.

"He is very cross to-night," said Lady Jesmond. "I wish I could break him of that absurd habit he has of always crying for me."

"It is natural enough," I answered. "Children generally cry for their mothers."

'Things that are most natural are not always most pleasant," said Lady Jesmond decidedly.

And then I wondered whether she had any heart, whether she felt any emotion on coming to this her husband's home—the place where his boyish days had been spent.

"It must have been a trial," I said to her, "for you to come home without Paul."

"Yes—a great trial," the replied; but there was no note of regret or pain in the calm sweet voice. "I think, Miss Gordon, I will go to my room now. I have brought no maid with me; perhaps I can have a little assistance from yours?"

"With pleasure," I replied.

During all this time she had stood with her travelling cloak, which was slightly edged with fur, even though it was summer-drawn tightly around her and her face closely veiled.

"I am afraid," I said, "that you feel cold."

"Cold!" she repeated in a voice of wonder.

"Most people suffer much from cold when they first come from India," I remarked.

"Yes; I suffered greatly the first few days after my arrival in England. I did not attempt to leave the house for a fortnight, but postponed my visit to Mr. Benson until I felt a little seasoned. Now I will go to my room."

I did not ask her where she had been staying, or with whom. She was not the kind of person with whom I felt I could take such a liberty, however kind the intention might be.

My maid was summoned, and showed her ladyship to her room. I was left with conflicting sensations, and I seemed quite unable to form any idea of the character of my newly found cousin. If any one had asked me whether I liked her, I could not have answered the question.

I hastened to give aunt Annette, who was anxiously awaiting me, an account of the interview. I could not tell her what I thought of Lady Jesmond, for I had no definitely-formed opinion upon the point. I told her all about the pretty child with his father's face, and the elderly nurse, and of Lady Jesmond's solicitude for her.

"That speaks well for her," said aunt Annette. "Good women are always thoughtful for their servants."

Why did those words haunt me—"good as she is beautiful"?

I did not go down stairs until the dinner bell rang; when I did so, I found Mr. Benson alone in the dining room. Her ladyship had not yet come down.

"Well?" he cried eagerly, and waited for me to speak.

The next moment the rustling of silk and crape told us that Lady Jesmond was near.

I cannot describe what I felt when I beheld her ladyship's marvellous loveliness. I have never seen anything like it; it was perfect, surpassing loveliness; and with it was that subtle irresistible charm which men call fascination. As I gazed at her, Lady Saxon's words came back to me—"a worshipper of beauty, a dreamer of dreams."

Tall and slender, her figure was the very perfection of grace. She had such shapely shoulders as are rarely seen; and, lightly veiled by thin black crape, they shone white as alabaster through their gauzy covering. Her hands were delicate and white, and were adorned with many valuable rings; her arms were as though they had been sculptured. She was a blonde of the purest type; even the hot sun of India had not marred the faultless delicacy of her complexion. Her eyes were blue, large, bright, and clear, full of fire, with a gleam of passion—eyes that could smile and flash, that could woo with all sweetness "and scorn with all fire"—eyes that startled by their unusual brightness and their depth of expression. The brows were dark and straight. Her mouth was perfect, with the most alluring of dimples; yet there was in the short upper lip something that told of pride and scorn. From her crown of golden hair to her dainty little feet, she was simply a masterpiece of nature's handiwork, without one blemish in her fair loveliness.

Even Mr. Benson's calm face flushed as he hastened to greet her with a low bow and extended hand.

"I am glad to see you looking so well, Lady Jesmond," he said.

She looked at him with a world of mischief in her eyes.

"You do not say 'Welcome to Jesmond!'" she remarked playfully. "That is because Miss Gordon is here, and you think it would hardly be in good taste. You are right, but Miss Gordon and I are already very good friends."

Mr. Benson was quite at a loss how to reply to these candid utterances. It seemed to me that her beauty had robbed him of all power of speech. She then turned to me with an amused smile, and I could see that she was gratified by my look of admiration.

MISERS AND THEIR HOARDS.

Famous Grubbers of Gold and the Wealth they Hid.

There is every reason to believe that the hoards of money and valuables one often reads of as having been discovered by workmen while engaged in pulling down old houses have been secreted by misers; the result is that, in many cases, property thus found is taken possession of by persons whom the misers never intended to benefit namely—their heirs-at-law and next of kin.

It is pretty certain that misers of both sexes existed years ago, as they do in our own day, and the following notes concerning some notable examples of this class of monomaniacs may not be uninteresting. Of those who made it a rule of their lives to "gather gear by every wile," the case of M. Osterwald, who died at Paris in 1791, is remarkable, as shewing that the richest man in a city may also be the most miserable one. He was the son of a poor minister, and began life as a clerk in a banking-house at Hamburg, where he acquired a small sum, which he augmensed by his speculations in business and his economical mode of living; he afterwards came to Paris, where he accumulated his enormous fortune. He was a bachelor—the expenses of a wife and children being incompatible with his frugal mode of living. He had for a servant a poor wretch, whom he never permitted to enter his apartment; he had always promised that at his death he should be handsomely recompensed, and accordingly he left him a pittance of six months' wages and a suit of clothes, but, as he expressly stated, "not the most new." A few days before his death some of his acquaintances, who saw that he was reduced to the last extremity by want of nourishment, proposed to him to have some soup. "Yes, yes," he replied, "it is easy to talk of soup—but what is to become of the meat?" Thus died one who was reported to be the richest man in Paris, more from want of care and proper nourishment than disease. He is stated to have left to his relations, whom he had probably never seen, the sum of £3 000,000 Under his bolster was found 800 000 in paper money.

The neighborhood where Mary Luchorne died seems to be still famous for its misers. In 1877 there died at Woolwich, England, a Mr. John Clarke, aged 86. He is described as being a man of education, but a very singular character; although reputed as immensely wealthy, he was very miserly in his habits, and lived to the last in a squalid hovel in the poorest part of Woolwich; the greater portion of his life was spent in the accumulation of books, of which he left a large store. It was reported that the front shutters of his house had not been open for over thirty years; he never took a regular meal, nor did he know the tastes of wines or spirits. Yet, notwithstanding that he lived in such a den and suffered such privations, he reached an octogenarian age, and died worth $200 000 or thereabouts.

An instance of miserly habits in the great and noble is to be found in the case of that renowned captain, the Duke of Marlborough of whom it is chronicled that, when in the last stage of life and very infirm, he would walk from the public room in Bath, to his lodgings on a cold, dark night, to save sixpence in chair hire. He died worth $7,500,000.

It is recorded of Sir James Lowther that, after changing a piece of silver in George's coffee house, and paying twopence for his dish of coffee, he was helped into his chariot (he was then very lame and infirm). and went home. Some time after he returned to the same coffee house on purpose to acquaint the woman who kept it that she had given him a bad half penny, and demanded another in exchange for it. Sir James is stated to have then had about $200,000 per annum coming in, and was at a loss whom to appoint his heir.

Sir Thomas Colby, an official high in office, shortened his existence by his passion for this world's goods, as appears by the following anecdote: "He rose in the middle of the night, when he was in a very profuse perspiration and walked down stairs to look for the key of the cellar, which he had inadvertently left on a table in the parlor; he was apprehensive that his servants might seize the key and rob him of a bottle of port wine, instead of which he himself was seized with a chill and died intestate, leaving over $1 000,000 in the funds, which was shared by five or six day laborers, who were his next of kin." Marvelous good luck for his poor relations!

At Northfield, England, there died in 1772 a Mr Page, dealer in limestones and gunflints, by which occupation, and by a most penurious way of living, he had accumulated a fortune of some $60 000. He lived alone in a large house for several years, no one coming near him but an old woman in the village who once a day went to make his bed. His death was occasioned by his running a knife into the palm of his hand while opening an oyster.

Some years since a chiffonnier (or rag and refuse gatherer) died intestate in France, having literally "scraped" together 400,000 francs, the whole of which went to the heir-at-law.

A New Jersey Porcupine.

A most remarkable conquest was made by four hunters at Millbrook, N. J., recently. James and Frank Kimble, Amos Van Gorden, and Abe Warner went on the mountain hunting raccoons. Their dogs, late in the evening, barked up a tree. Hastening to the tree they saw on a limb about 40 feet from the ground, what they supposed to be a "coon." Mr. Warner climbed the tree and shook the animal out. When it fell to the ground the dogs attacked it, but it succeeded in running into the rocks and was followed by the dogs. Here they managed, after a sharp and severe struggle, to kill it. The men then took sticks and succeeded in getting it out, when to their great surprise, it proved to be a large porcupine, which would have weighed at least 25 pounds.

How People Enter a [Car].

Have you ever noticed how different people enter a car? It is a study. [The ex]perienced traveler drops into the first [va]cant seat; if there are more than one, he takes the one on the shady side. Here are two ladies; they pass two or three seats; they are all alike, but neither seems just the thing. They pass down the aisle, [pass] more seats, walk back again to where they came in, then carry their luggage back to the seats they first looked at, and drop down exhausted. Now comes a party just from the farm. They don't ride much; the [old] man leads the party, and carries the baby; the madam drags two small boys, and the four take the side seat just by the door, look around with a satisfied air, seem to think they are in luck to get inside. [It] was a wild western passenger whose entrance was peculiar. He had been accustomed to riding in stage coaches; the door of a stage is on the side, and is about the size of a car window. The passenger knew of no reason why a car should have a door in the end, so when his first train rolled up to the platform he saw the window, it was open, and it was big enough, so he got in fast.

"I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why, I cannot tell."

It has often been wondered at, the [bad] odor this oft-quoted doctor was in. [It was] probably because he, being one of the [old] school doctors, made up pills as large as bullets, which nothing but an ostrich could bolt without nausea. Hence the dislike. Dr. R. V. Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is un[questioned], as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, [305] King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star

Breeders and their Character[istics]

CROSSES.

The introduction of gigantic As[iatic] [poul]try produces a great change for t[he] [...] in our poultry-yards. The littl[e] [...] bony fowls, we once called poultry [are] almost forgotten; for one or othe[r] [im]proved breeds has left its impre[ss] [on] poultry from Maine to California; [the] greatest improvement for general u[se] [of t]he new breeds produced by cro[ssing] [the] Asiatics with our small, non-setting [breeds] produce a permanent breed that w[ill] [raise t]heir own young, make fair table-b[irds], [ma]ture early and be fair layers. This [was t]ried in the Plymouth Rocks, wit[h] [a] degree of success; I say a fair deg[ree, as I a]m not as well pleased as some pe[ople] with fowls of this breed as now br[ed]. [The]re are my reasons: too much im[portance ha]s been attached to size; this bri[ngs out] [th]e Asiatic feature, and the produc[tion of] heavy, clumsy birds is encouraged [at the] expense of laying qualities, as I am [sure th]e smallest Plymouth Rocks lay th[e best, as t]hey partake more of the Dominique [charac]teristic in being prolific layers.

Another new breed from Asiatic c[ross] [w]hich promises much if the "A[merican] standard of excellence" does not in[sist too m]uch on size, is the Wyandotte. T[his is an] [As]iatic cross on the Hamburg, whic[h is too s]mall a fowl to be very useful in itse[lf. In] this new form, we have a comely, [good-lo]oking, closely-feathered, small a[nd rose-co]mbed, yellow legged, early-feather[ing, early-m]aturing, strong breed, which do the[ir own ha]tching, and are quite peaceable bir[ds. W]e should keep them down to a fair s[ize; w]e may as well breed pure Asiatic[s. The]se the fine laying characteristics [of the H]amburgs, which is a great feature [of fo]wls of that breed, though their egg[s are sm]all. The Wyandott eggs are not [...], [bu]t they are of a fair marketable size, [which th]e Hamburgs' are not. What we ga[in in th]is breed is a hardier and larger bird [than th]e Hamburg, combining the laying [and ot]her qualities enumerated above.

Another cross which attracted muc[h atten]tion at the New York Fanciers' E[xhibiti]on last winter, was one between the [Dorkin]g and Langshan. The off-prings [are i]mmense birds. Both parents belong to [...] [br]eeds; but the Langshan is hardier [than th]e Dorking, and the off-spring of the [cross m]atures very much earlier for Spring c[hicken]s than birds of either ancestral bre[ed].—[H]enry Hales, in Rural New Yorker.

A Good Potato.

When cut into, the colour of a good p[otato], says the Irish Farmers' Gazette, sh[ould be a] yellowish white; if it be a deep yel[low it] will not cook well. There must be a [consid]erable amount of moisture, though [not en]ough to collect in drops and fall off, [even wi]th moderate pressure. Rub the pieces [toge]ther, and if the potato is good, a f[roth wi]ll appear around the edges and also u[pon th]e two surfaces after they are separa[ted. Th]is signifies the presence of a proper qu[antit]y of starch—the more froth the m[ore sta]rch, and consequently the better [the po]tato; while the less there is, the poore[r it wi]ll cook. The quantity of the starchy c[onte]nt may also be judged by the more [or les]s ready adherance of the two parts. Breeders and their Characteristics.

CROSSES.

The introduction of gigantic Asiatic poultry produces a great change for the better in our poultry-yards. The little, spare, bony fowls, we once called poultry, are now almost forgotton; for one or other of the improved breeds has left its impress on our poultry from Maine to California; but the greatest improvement for general use lies in the new breeds produced by crossing the Asiatics with our small, non-setting birds to produce a permanant breed that will hatch their own young, make fair table-birds, mature early and be fair layers. This has been tried in the Plymouth Rocks, with a fair degree of success; I say a fair degree, as I am not as well pleased as some people are with fowls of this breed as now bred, and there are my reasons: too much importance has been attached to size; this brings out the Asiatic feature, and the production of heavy, clumsy birds is encouraged at the expense of laying qualities. as I am certain the smallest Plymouth Rocks lay the best; they partake more of the Dominique characteristic in being prolific layers.

Another new breed from Asiatic crossing, which promises much if the "American Standard of excellence" does not insist too much on size, is the Wyandotte. This is an Asiatic cross on the Hamburg, which is to small a fowl to be very useful in itself; but in this new form, we have a comely, clean-looking, closely-feathered, small and flat-combed, yellow legged, early-feathering and maturing, strong breed, which do their own hatching, and are quite peaceable birds, but we should keep them down to a fair size, or we may as well breed pure Asiatics, and lose the fine laying characteristics of the Hamburgs, which is a great feature with fowls of that breed, though their eggs are small. The Wyandott eggs are not large, but they are of a fair marketable size, which the Hamburgs are not. What we gain in this breed is a hardier and larger bird than the Hamburg, combining the laying and other qualities enumerated above.

Another cross which attracted much attention at the New York Fanciers' Exhibition last winter, was one between the Dorking and Langshan. The offsprings were immense birds. Both parents belong to large breeds; but the Langshan is hardier than the Dorking, and the offspring of the two matures very much earlier for Spring chickens than birds of either ancestral breed.—Henry Hales, in Rural New Yorker.

A Good Potato.

When cut into, the colour of a good potato, says the Irish Farmers' Gazette, should be yellowish white; if it be a deep yellow, it will not cook well. There must be a considerable amount of moisture, though not enough to collect in drops and fall off even with moderate pressure. Rub the pieces together, and if the potato is good, a froth will appear around the edges and also upon the two surfaces after they are separated. This signifies the presence of a proper quantity of starch—the more froth the more starch, and consequently the better the potato; while the less there is, the poorer it will cook. The quantity of the starchy element may also be judged by the more or less ready adherance of the two parts. If the adherance be sufficient for one piece to hold the other up, that fact is evidence of a good article. These are the experiments usually made by experts when buying potatoes, and are the best tests that can be given short of boiling; but even they are by no means infallible.

Wheat Sowing.

The practice of sowing wheat after the corn crop for the Northern farmer, a striking feature in Southern farm management, and might in some instances, be adopted also in the northern sections to good advantage. Early in September, when the corn has come to maturity, three or four rows, in intervals at about sixty feet, are cut down. The open spaces are then thoroughly harrowed and sown to wheat with the drill. Afterwards the corn is all cut and placed in shocks on these seeded strips, when the rest of the field is ready for harrow and drill. If the soil is hard or baked, the harrow is often followed down with a short piece of timber with a small leg, for the purpose of making a smooth and mellow seed bed.

For ages wheat and all small grain had been sown broadcast, thus precluding the possibility of cultivation, and this practice still prevails. For many years, however, drilling wheat has been practised on the better managed farms of America and Europe, and the implement made specially for planting the grain in drills, a few inches apart, is now considered as an essential article for the farm planter to own.

Experience has shown that the use of the drill is advantageous. It distributes the seed with great regularity, thick or thin, as may be preferred; the growth of the crop is made more uniform; more sunlight and air goes to the roots of the wheat, and the yield is generally more and of better quality, as is the case with wheat sown broadcast. In some instances the advantages are very striking; in others, not so manifest; but together it is found to be a great improvement on the old custom of seeding broadcast. There is every reason therefore to continue it.

Ensilage Without a Silo.

Ensilling without a silo—that is, stacking green stuff in the open air—has been practised by M. Cormouls-Houles in France. The open air silo was constructed in May in the usual by building a stack of 30 cartloads of green trefoil, lucerne, and other grasses. No pressence was visible, whether the stacking was done in wet or dry weather. As to the stock which consumed the products, 60 cattle were fed indifferently on ensilage from the stacked and from the pits, and were turned out into the fields for exercise alone. M. Cormouls Houles insists upon the necessity of cutting the grasses and the other products being ensilled while freshly cut. His workmen, during his absence, placed in the middle of the stack four or five cartloads of hay cut some days previously, and the result was a horizontal section of mould right across the stack exactly where the partially dried material had been placed. He is trying maize, treating it to the same treatment.

It will pay to spend a little leisure time, in cold weather, in re-nailing every loose board, and in battening up the cracks about the stables to shut out the cold and make them comfortable. It is simply barbarous to confine the stock in cold, bleak stables, and compel them to shiver out the cold Winter on dry food alone; and any man who will be so cruel and inhuman, not to say shortsighted, should be doomed to live on hard-tack and sleep in an open garret with simply a sheet for covering. It may be such treatment would remind him of the proverb "A merciful man is merciful to his beast."

Taking A Chinaman Home.

Yesterday morning a solemn-looking Chinaman went west on the Union Pacific train. He was escorted to the depot by half a dozen of his almond-eyed countrymen, who parted with him with envy in their hearts, for he was bound to his old home in the Flowery Kingdom, while they are doomed for a while longer to mangle the Melican man's linen. In the pocket of the traveller was a check for a leather gripsack, which he was careful to see loaded on the baggage car before he boarded the train. There would be nothing peculiar about this were it not that the leather grip contained the bones of a good Chinaman being transported back to the Celestial paradise free of expense.

Nine years ago Ching Lee, then a new arrival from Chinaland, strolled into Beindorf's bakery, and tackled his first dish of ice cream. Ching found it "belly good," and ordered a whole quart, which he ate on the spot. The day was oppressively hot, and not having a chill-proof lining like the average Omaha girl, Ching found his load very uncomfortable. While passing from the table to the street there was a Græco-Roman struggle between the iceberg within and the furnace without, and Ching was thrown. He fell on the sidewalk, and in five minutes he was a dead Chinaman.

After Ching had been buried two years a party of Chinese officials who were en route home stopped in Omaha to get his body and take it with them. The grave was opened and the remains taken out, but they were not in shape for shipment, and were reburied. Sexton Medlock, at the request of the mandarins, took from the casket at that time a hand mirror, an empty wallet, and about 80 cents in money, which had been buried with the corpse. The three suits of clothes in which Ching was dressed were also taken off and planted under a tree in another part of the cemetery.

Sunday morning Ching's grave was opened the second time. Five or six of the deceased's countrymen were present with a "joss" man, and a number of Americans watched the ceremony from a respectable distance. After considerable blowing and scraping, a basket of eatables was produced, and a goodly dinner spread about the head of the grave. A chicken roasted with the head on occupied the post of honor, flanked on either side by large pieces of boiling pork and liver. Tea was made in a curious little Chinese caddy, and a number of cups poured out and placed on the ground. Then, after more bowing and scraping, several packages of cigarettes were strewed over the grave, and innumerable sticks of incense lighted. More incantations by the "joss" man followed, and when the mourners had bowed themselves tired the casket was opened and the remains shovelled out. The bones which were free from flesh, and perfectly dry, were rolled up in a piece of coarse sheeting and sewed up, after which they were placed in the valis. While Medlock was busy packing Ching's remains for shipment two of the Chinamen jumped into the grave and pawed over the earth at the bottom with their fingures in order to make sure that nothing belonged to the deceased's anatomy was left behind.

Satisfied that they had secured all of Ching's bones, the Celesticals drank the tea that had been standing about the grave, gathered up the eatables and came back to town, chattering like magpies, and smoking the cigarettes they had offered up to their dead countryman. The valise was taken by the journeying Celestial to his lodging and put under his bed, where it remained until the custodian started with it for China Monday noon.

DREADFUL MURDER IN RUSSIA.

Six People Cruelly Butchered—The Murderers Escape.

The Novoe Vremya publishes some details of a frightful tragedy recently committed in the parish of Balakovo, on the left bank of the Volga, and in the government of Saratoff. The victims are six in number—viz., a merchant's widow named Krasillnikoff, her two children, a seamstress, a man-servant, and a coachman. The murderous band was apparently acting upon a full knowledge of the house and personnel of the family. The third youngest child, which usually slept with the seamstress, was given by the latter on the evening of the murder to the cook, who slept in the kitchen. The cook and this child, an infant at the breast, were the only two of the household who escaped the premeditated general butchery. All the members of the household were asleep when the robbers and assassins sealed the courtyard wall. With an evident foreknowledge of the place, they proceeded to the coach-house, where the coachman was sleeping. The latter appears to have made a desperate resistance, but was ultimately dispatched. The murderers then ascended to the roof of the house and entered by a skylight. Mme. Krasillnikoff, the two elder children, and the seamstress slept in separate rooms on the upper story, and were murdered simultaneously. In the case of the seamstress a bill-hook or chopper appears to have been the weapon used. The man-servant, who slept on the ground floor, and the cook with the child in the kitchen, were awakened by the cries above. The cook, with the infant in her arms, rushed out to arouse the coachman, but only to find his mangled corpse, and, being too terrified either to return to the house or to fly to the village, she concealed herself, and managed to still the cries of the infant. The man-servant, immediately following the cook's flight from the house, was cut down on the threshold. The murderers then made a search for the missing cook and child, but failed to discover the place of their concealment. After pillaging the house the murderers locked the door and left. The terrified cook raised an alarm, and messengers were dispatched to the police, who only arrived late the following forenoon, when, of course, the murderers had made good their escape.

TRANSVAAL GOLD.

Another Addition to the Wealth of South Africa—Rich Quartz Discoveries.

For months past the late discoveries of gold in the Transvaal republic have been the principal topic of conversation throughout South Africa, and a large number of people have thrown up employment in the colony and Natal to proceed to the new El Dorado at Moodie's. As a great many Americans are now coming out for these fields, it may be interesting to your readers to know where they are situated, and what the surrounding country is like. Moodie's holding, upon which the reef called after him is situated, is estimated to be 170 miles west by south from the Portuguese town of Delagoa Bay, and about the same distance northeast of Pretoria, a town of some importance, containing about a couple of thousand inhabitants. But the actual distances are not known, for there are so many roads that few parties travel by the same route, and for the last twenty miles or so there are no roads at all, and from the nature of the country but little possibility of making any. There are two main overland routes to Moodie's and the fields farther north from Natal and the Cape Colony—one, the post-cart route, through Potchefstroom, Pretoria, and Middleburg, the other through Utrecht and New Scotland. The latter is the short-route, but it is unsafe at present owing to the unsettled condition of the natives. There is also a route by sea from Durban (Natal) to Delagoa bay, and thence overland. This is the quickest way of getting to Moodie's, but the chances are that you carry your death-warrant with you in the shape of the deadly coast fever.

The road from Delagoa bay is only safe during the months of June, July and August, when the weather is cool and but little rain falls. The country near the coats is a succession of huge swamps, where the wagons sink up to their axles, and two, sometimes three, teams, of sixteen oxen each, have to be inspanned to get the blundering, unwielding vehicles through. Several large rivers have to be forded, and here accidents are more the rule than the exception. One river, the Crocodile, is aptly named. A few weeks ago the sub-editor of one of the Durban papers, when crossing it, suddenly disappeared. It was subsequently discovered that he—or at least a considerable portion of him—had taken an involuntary berth inside a crocodile, which officiated as a rifle target shortly afterward. When the lower country is passed the traveller has to make his way as best he can over a range of lofty hills. The track here is incumbered with immense boulders, many of which are as big as an ordinary three-story house. Wagons generally break down on this section of the journey if they have not come to grief previously, and many parties have to abandon their wagons here and go to camp on foot, taking what goods and baggage they can carry on their mules and oxen. Horses and oxen will not live any length of time in this part of the country, and the only hope to get them through is to push forward as fast as possible. Mules fare somewhat better, but the donkey is the beast of burden for work in the Crocodile and Koop river country. He is sure-footed, will live on scrub-brush if he can get it, and thrive on rocks when he can get nothing else, and the bite of the dreaded taetse fly scarcely appears to inconvenience him at all, while to oxen and horses it is certain death.

Many travelers have asserted that this unpleasant little insect does not extend its dental proclivities to the human species. Those travelers either wilfully lied—and being personally acquainted with the majority of them I may safely say that their capabilities for the economization of truth rank little, if at all, below those of the average Cretan—or they must have been physically pachydermatous. I do not pretend to be a great African traveller, though I have meandered over a considerable extent of the country. I have shot at an elephant, but I missed him, which, considering that my only weapon was a Winchester rifle of the old rim-fire, pop-gun make, was probably quite as well for me as it was for the elephant; and I once wounded a buffalo, which turned out to be a black bullock, and which I did not go after for prudential reasons that may easily be comprehended by the class of sportsmen to which, I fear, I belong. But I have been bitten by tsetse fly, and I remembered that bite for some considerable time subsequently. It is only, however, during the eight or nine hot months of the year that these pests are really troublesome to man or dangerous to cattle, and, once the high bush belt between the swamps and the very high country is passed, one need be under no apprehensions of loss or inconvenience from this pest.

This fly, however is not the only objectionable specimen of the animal kingdom with which the gold miner is likely to make acquaintance on his road to the Transvaal fields. Snakes are plentiful, and most of them are exceedingly venomous, and there are enough tarantula, centipedes, and scorpions to furnish an unpleasantly liberal allowance to countries where these horrors are not included in the census. The climate, however, in the high country about Moodie's is probably one of the grandest in creation. In the winter months it is bright, bracing, but always dry, and sometimes exceedingly cold. In the summer the heat during the daytime is enough to melt a salamander, but it is a dry heat, and therefore nothing like so trying as the continual summer vapor-bath on the coast. There is water in abundance, but it has to be led some distance for mining operations. Wood is not over plentiful, but there is coal in the neighborhood of the mines, and this will be the fuel of the future. At present most of the diggers have to be content to use cow-dung—and excellent fuel it makes, too—though the aroma it produces in burning is not exactly the sort of thing that Eugene Rimmel makes his dollars out of. Life is necessarily of the roughest; but the life of the pioneer miners generally belong to this category. Most things can be had by paying for them, but the prices are, in some cases, such as no sensible man would think of giving. However, any man who is not blessed—or cursed—with a gigantic appetite, can manage to exist tolerably well on £10 a month, and if he cannot afford this modest outlay, he is not likely to succeed as a miner.

With regard to the quartz, I may say that I have seen and handled a great deal of it. Some was fabulously rich. There was actually more gold than quartz in the specimens. But this was picked stuff, and went to England for the purpose of enticing capitalists to invest. Much of it would yield one hundred ounces to the ton. Of course this must not be taken as the average. The majority of the quartz, however, is certainly very rich, and the general opinion of old Australian and Californian miners is that from two to seven ounces may be accepted as a general average. There are at present about 1,200 men on Moodie's reef. Many of them are almost starving. The latter are mostly clerks who have thrown up situations in stores and gone up to the fields without either money or mining experience. The same class of men starved in the early days of the diamond fields simply because they did not possess the physique for hard manual labor and wanted to make fortunes by working at their claims. Men who understand mining are doing well. The country at present is entirely unsettled. The Transvaal legislature is powerless to protect the concessionaires, and the only law at the gold fields is that of Mr. Justice Lynch. Native labor is not over plentiful, but so soon as the Swazie chiefs find out that the fields are being worked—as they eventually will be—by an exclusively English speaking population, they will be only too willing to send down their men in parties to contract for six or twelve month's work.—[Port Elizebeth Cor. Excavations in Greece.

Excavations are being carried on with great activity and more or less success in various parts of Greece. Upon the site of the temple of Asklepios, at Epidauros, and upon that of the Amphiareion, at Oropos, in Attica, the diggings, which have been going on simultaneously for some time past, have resulted in the discovery of numerous pieces of sculpture and inscriptions of value. The excavations begun several years ago on the site of the Temple of Eleusis have been resumed after a considerable pause. In all these cases the work is conducted by the Archæological Society of Athens. The Greek Government on the other hand, has taken up a very extensive and important task in Athens itself, where it is engaged in thoroughly examining the Acropolis. Two years ago a portion of the ancient citadel, lying to the southeast of the Parthenon, was cleared by order of the Ephor, M. Kastratiades, and resulted in the discovery of numerous very beautiful and remarkable monuments and remains of ancient Attic art. It was accordingly determined thoroughly to explore the entire site of the Acropolis. The work has been begun by the new Ephor, M. Stamatakis, on a large scale, and already a considerable portion of the mediæval and Turkish fortifications surrounding and disfiguring the hill have been demolished and removed. The appointment of M. Stamatakis as Ephor-General of the antiquities of the Kingdom of Greece is the best guarantee that this important work will be carefully and thoroughly executed. For many years past the new Superintendent has distinguished himself by his labors in bringing to light and preserving antiquities in all parts of Greece. The practical direction of the work of demolition and excavation has been intrusted to Dorpfeld, a German architect, who is well known for his labors in connection with Dr. Schliemann.

A Maine Farmer's Fish Story.

A farmer who was in town from Wells, Wednesday morning, related a remarkable circumstance which happened in his town one day recently. For some time past the herring have remained away from shore, and the fishermen were unable to obtain them in very large numbers. All at once they began to come in shore, even into the breakers, in immense numbers, probably being frightened by dogfish or bluefish. The number kept increasing, and when the tide went out it left a place of about an acre completely covered with the fish. In some spots, where there was a depression in the sand, the fish were piled in to the depth of about five feet. The farmers in the vicinity soon learned of the fact, and they flocked to the shore and secured cartloads of the fish to be used on their farms as fertilizers. One farmer obtained 60 cartloads.

It is said that the French railroad companies are about to adopt an electric gate opener. A catch connected with an electro-magnet keeps the gates closed. The same apparatus rings a bell violently on the approach of a train.

Lead tanks which withstood sulphuric acid perfectly, Mr. S. P. Sharples reports, were soon destroyed by hydrochloric acid. In some recent experiments undertaken to destroy cotton there by means of hot hydrochloric acid it was found that lead-lined vessels were soon rendered useless by it. In Japan the brass is bronzed by using a solution of copper sulphate, alum, and verdigris.

Some remarks were recently made by M. F. Tisserand on the subject of the theory of the figure of the planets. His calculations and estimates of their present form were founded upon the assumption that the celestial bodies were originally in the fluid state, subject only to the mutual attraction of their constituent elements, and endowed with a rotary movement with very slight angular velocity. Their outer surface would thus be somewhat of a revolving ellipsoid.

Origin of a Few Oaths.

The courtiers of Louis IX. were wont to indulge in swearing to an extent that was both painful and distressing to the good king, their master, although the penalty prescribed in the statute book for the offance was no less than branding the tongue with a red-hot iron for every commission of it. The oaths most offensive to the saintly monarch were the "cordieus," the "tetedieus," the "paradieus," etc., which still survive in Moliere and Rabelais. At this time there was at the palace, belonging to one of the ladies of the court, a little pet dog named "Bleu." To elude the harsh sentence of the law, which might deprive them forever of the power of indulging in their favorite pastime, the courtiers determined to substitute for "dieu" the name of the dog. So "cordieu" became "corbleu," "tetedieu" "tetebleu," etc., and the apparently meaningless words are preserved to the present day. "Sacredieu" became "sacrebleu," and was finally contracted to "sacre." This last is the most common of French oaths nowadays (except "mon Dieu." The dandies of ancient Rome used to swear by all the gods indiscriminately, although it was customary for each one to have his favorite oath. Castor and Pollux were the favorites among the demi-gods to swear by Gemini, they meant to swear by Castor and Pollux, the twins. This oath has come down to us, even to the present day, when the expression "By Jiminy!" is frequently heard. "The deuce!" is a very ancient oath, indeed, as will appear from the derivation to which it is referred—the Latin Deus—God. Nowadays it is considered a mild oath to say "the deuce!" It is a curious thing that deuce is generally supposed to mean the "devil." So people say, "go to the deuce!" The origin of the phrase "by jingo" is traced to the word Jincoa—the baser name for God.

Too Imitative by Far.

Mrs. Renshler of Madison Wis., killed a chicken in the presence of her little boys, cutting its head off with a hatchet. The boys became interested in the proceeding and while the mother was in the house the older boy prevailed upon the younger to play the part of chicken and actually had his head on the block and was in the act of chopping off his head when the older brother accidentally noticed the game and stopped the operation before any serious damages had been inflicted.

MARKDALE NOV. 6, 1884.

THE FINANCIAL DEPRESSION.

That there is a depression in the financial world, none will attempt to deny; but, while those periods of depression come with such apparent certainty, and we might say, periodical regularity, it is not absolutely necessary that each individual, in an agricultural country like this, should suffer any material inconvenience therefrom.

It is well to consider the cause, or some of the causes of hard times. It is a well known fact that prosperity begets extravagance and speculation, and these, together with the credit system, are sufficient to bring about universal depression to those who come within their domain. Extravagance and the credit system are twin brothers: the latter is good in its place, but is so terribly abused, causing so much loss and ruin, that it is difficult to say a good word for it. It is not the expense of supplying the actual necessaries of life which cause hard times and general depression among the agricultural community, but rather in making investments, (not absolutely necessary) with a prospect of good crops and high prices. The prudent, industrious agriculturist is not suffering any serious embarrassment from the present depression, and why should he. There is no doubt the untimely frost in the harvest of '83 did incalculable damage, yet all kinds live stock brought a remarkably high price. Where mixed farming is carried on—as is the rule in Ontario—the chances for serious losses are greatly lessened, as there is seldom a failure of all the products in one season, while it is often the case that when one kind of produce is a partial failure, some other makes up for it either in abundant yield or in price. The present season we consider above an average prosprous one to the farmer; this statement will be doubtless startling to many at first thought. Let us consider it for a moment. All kinds of grain is above an average crop, and the quality universally good; while the harvest weather was all that could be desired, thereby enabling the husbandman to gather in the products of the farm in the best possible condition. The markets are low, especially wheat; yet, on the whole, we do not consider the price of farm produce any farther under an average than the combined quality and quantity is above. Then stock (which is fast becoming an important branch of mixed husbandry and should receive still greater attention) though not as high in price as in recent years, is still an average, while butter keeps up, and eggs are extremely high, cheese holds its own, and roots and fruits are an abundant crop, but low in price, so that an average here may be counted. Now that we have made out the year 1884 an average prosperous season to the farmer, as far as the products of the farm and prices for the same is concerned, we wish further to draw attention to the current prices of mercantile goods. Are the prices not extremely low in every department, groceries, dry goods, hardware, agricultural implements, and everything you could mention (except perhaps ladies bonnets), while there is no material advance in wages for labor. Now, where does the boot pinch. Since the present season is, on the whole, a prosperous one, where does the general depression come in. Oh, but one says, I am behind since last year. Just so, in nine cases out of ten the cause can be traced to extravagance and speculation, counting on ungrown crops and unrealized prices, in short, counting the chickens before they are hatched. Now, each individual for themselves may avoid untold hardship by studying the cause and effect of the so called hard times. While this applies to all classes, it is specially applicable to the agricultural community; as, in a country where farming is the chief pursuit of the country, all other classes must necessarily be affected by its condition.

GOOSE QUILL.

'Tis sweet to remember the days of our youth, when we were compelled to undergo the bitter experience of making our own pen from a goose-quill. Sad recollection; but, the tuition we learned in that primitive day has stood us in good stead against the shocks of democratic violence which have assailed us from time to time.

Last Monday evening, news was brought into town, that a flock of wild geese had "lit" upon Plewes' millpond. Accordingly, next morning, two hours before the dawn, there were tinkers, tailors, weavers, shoe-makers, butchers, yard-stick men of the counter stripe, sallied forth with single-barrels and double-barrelled guns, with deadly intent upon the feathered tribe. Arrived at the pond, daylight was as anxiously sought for, as was darkness on the eve of Waterloo. While waiting—wishing—waiting—for the dawn of day the good Morpheus cast his balming wand over the features of the tallest man in the assembly, and sent him to the land of Nod, True to his instincts, and a verification of the adage that the master makes the man, R.....ds took a pious seat upon the warm stomach of the sleeping representative of Markdale's intellectuality. With the peep of dawn the Master of Ceremonies, Gander Flock, ordered his household into morning exercise, when, with a cruelty known only to sportsmen, Nimrod J..... H..... let fly with both triggers of his double-barrelled gun, and brought down four of the feathered beauties. With a daring that would have done credit to Leander of the Hellespont swimming match, Master J. E. R., of Mack's Commercial House, boldly plunged into the seething waters, and recovered the game. But! lo!! and behold, they had slaughtered four members of the innocent flock of a worthy citizen—but not intentionally. Boys, put on your night-glass next time. In order to prevent a law suit and save costs the boys cheerfully paid the damages.

From our own correspondent.

R. G. Trimble, Esq., jeweller of this village, has, we understand, found an opening for his business more to his liking on the other side, to which Mrs. Trimble intends moving in a short time.

Harry Firth, Esq., painter, is about deciding to remove to Atcheson City, Kansas. Already there are a number from this locality in that city.

A very pleasant evening's entertainment and social was given last Friday evening at the residence of Mr. Andrew Carr, under the auspices of Presbyterian Ladies' Aid Society. The evening was unfavorable, but a good number turned out. A very enjoyable evening was spent in various games and amusements.

AMONG THE CHURCHES.

Saturday afternoon last the Rev. Mr. Chisholm of Maxwell preached in the Presbyterian Church; on Sabbath following the Sacrament and Lord's Supper was dispensed in the same church. The Rev. Mr. Wilson, Pastor, preached morning and evening.

The regular Quarterly services of the Canada Methodist Church was also held in that church on Sabbath Last. Services conducted by the pastor, Rev. D. C. McDowell.

The Rev. Mr. McGregor, Baptist Minister in this place, is about leaving his congregation here, having received a call to another field of labor.

"Sam" is fixing up the wee log house. "Hannah" had better be looking up white trimmings.

The 12th has run to orators lately. By gorry now "George" has taken the stump against the Scott Act; so has the big Conservative on the corner. The new money agent supports and defends it.

Letter From Manitoba.

Turtle Mountain, Oct., 1884.

DEAR STANDARD,—Two and a half years have rolled away since I struck this portion of Her Majesty's domain. I promised at that time I would write you something of my experience in the prairie province. Well, having located in the Turtle Mountain district, and spent two winters and three summers here, I am enabled to establish what I say. When I came here there were only three or four houses between here and Delorane, a place 20 miles east of this. Now I can stand in my door and count 98, and only half of the land in that territory in the market yet. This district lies along the boundry line between Manitoba and Dacota. The soil is a rich black loam with clay bottom. The inhabitants are of different nationality and are intelligent, industrious, highly moral and very enterprising and well-to-do.

The harvest has been an abundant one and saved in prime condition. We had this year 1,000 bushels of grain. We have splendid water; no sickness, a most contented and happy community, and prospects of a railway within 13 miles of the boundry next summer. We are, however, in need of housekeepers, as it is quite common for the one man to be cook, butler and plowboy. It does very well for a short time, but I tell you it soon grows monotonous. They tell me that out at Brandon, when an emigrant train is expected, the fence along the R. R. may be seen lined with young men, sitting waiting to get even a sight of a girl. Now just think how anxious they must be; you know the fences out here are made of barbed wire. Oak and poplar timber is to be had 12 miles from here. There are various kinds of wild fruit, such as cranberries, plums, etc. This is just the place for young men to make a start in life, with a good prospect of gaining for themselves in a short time easy and comfortable circumstances. I would not, however, advise those who are getting up in years and have a comfortable home in Ontario, to leave it.

The supposed cold winters up here are no dreaded object to us, having spent two of them, and being out all through from December to April, I consider the winter, on the whole, pleasant.

We get the STANDARD as regular as the week rolls round, and it is watched for as eagerly as the emigrant trains above, though not in the same position.

Yours truly,
JAMES A. ROWE,
Waskada
Man.

Hallowe'en.

Much as we reverence the customs and habits of the past, we cannot but reprobate such of their follies as carry with them the spirit of rowdyism. It must not be supposed that there is any night in the year when Her Majesty's Laws are inflexed to permit the perpetration of crime, with impunity.

The doings of last Friday night and Saturday morning convinces us that the sooner a barbarous custom gets its quietus thro' the instrumentality of civilized public opinion, so much the better for the general public.

Markets.—The prospects for any improvement in the price of wheat are indeed poor. The crop is so abundant throughout the world, and the corn crop of the United States also greatly above an average. There seems no reasonable prospect for an advance in price. The corn crop in the state of Kansas alone, for 1884, is estimated at 200,000,000, bushels.

The Lady Editor.—We have received a letter from a Toronto citizen giving some light on the character recently mentioned in this paper as having attempted to horsewhip one of our worthy citizens for refusing to subscribe for her paper. She is described as having fine address, good business tact, and well educated, but, is a notorious impostor; had published a sporting paper some months, but that enterprise collapsed some time ago. The letter describes her as a fit subject for jail or the lunatic asylum; that several judgments are out for her in Toronto.

GATHERED FROM EXCHANGES AND BOILED DOWN

Samuel and John McDowell, Jr., of Dundalk, left two weeks ago for British Columbia.

A movement is on foot by Mt. Forest men, favoring the formation of a new county, consisting of Normanby, Egremont and Proton from Grey, and Luther, Arthur and Minto from Wellington, with Mt. Forest as county town.

A foot race between Heriman of Owen Sound, and Case of Hamilton, for $400, is to take place in Owen Sound on Thanksgiving day.

The Oddfellows of Owen Sound celebrated their fifteenth anniversary on Tuesday evening, 28th, by an oyster supper and social in their hall.

The Brockville and Westport railway is now being agitated, and steps taken to have a by law submitted to the municipalities interested in assisting in the way of bonuses.

Hanover is to have a new grain elevator shortly.

A by-law to raise $200,000 by debentures for the erection of a new City hall for Toronto was submitted to a vote last Thursday and defeated by a majority of 562.

Mr. McLeod of Chatsworth, has invented a new self-binder which can be attached to any reaper, and binds with straw, instead of cord. He has secured the patent for Canada and the United States. We hope it will prove a complete success.

There is a very general feeling of hostility manifested by the Canadian press towards the annexation of Jamaica, and the papers which are not actively hostile show much indifference to the subject. By many the project is not regarded with any great seriousness. The Globe opposes it quite strongly, and many smaller papers echo its sentiments quite faithfully. But there does not seem to be any very strong impression that the scheme will come to anything. This is very much our own opinion. We regard it as quite unlikely that for a considerable time to come at anyrate, the question of Jamaica and other West India Islands joining the Canadian Confederacy, will be other than one of merely speculative interest and importance.

WM. BROWN.

A NAMELESS ROMANCE.

I have a leisure hour to spend now and then, and I spend it in rambling round the the city where I dwell. Perhaps some of you may think this is poor enjoyment, but it does not seem so to me. True, were I young and rich, I might seek my pleasures farther afield—on the sunny shores of the Mediterranean, or in the gay gardens of France. I might bask more in the smile of gentle dames, forgetting my loneliness, as one forgets in the sunshine that only a moment before the sky hung black with clouds. But I am neither young nor rich; and even if I were, it seems to me that no place in the world could ever be so dear as those lanes and meadows I love so well

Yes; I am old now, and chilly sometimes at night when the fire gets low, wearing a great coat even on the summer days, and shivering often when the zephyrs fan my face. But I am kept young by my love for nature; I woo her as amorously as ever maid was wooed by swain, and she is not afraid to press her rosy lips to mine, yellow and withered as they are, and to twine her lovely arms round my neck. I love her for her hopefulness, for her inexhaustible store of youth. Everywhere with love she rebukes poor mortals for sitting down sad with folded hands, and with a glad voice bids them be up and doing. She is irrepressible. You may crush her down with stony hand and plaster over every vestige of her beauty, and then say to yourself, in pride of heart, 'I have made a city, a place for commerce and traffic, and pleasure and sorrow;" and, yet, turn your back for an instant, lo! a little blade of grass comes up between the stones of the causeway and laughs in your very face. We may build our houses up story upon story, with the dingy attic at the top, for women's hearts to break in, and the squalid court beneath in which little children may get their first taint of sin; but a gleam of sunshine will day after day work its way down to the very centre of the filth and squalidness, and a rose will bud and bloom in some poor man's window, blushing back with pleasure into the face of its kindly keeper.

Then think how charitable she is, how slow to return an insult, how cheerfully she bears an affront. I often think—though, of course, it is but the vagary of an old dreamer—that those who build up masses of brick and mortar would be well repaid if nature left a sterile belt round their work, a belt gray and cold as their own walls. But no! She takes no such revenge as this. Long before the city smoke has mingled with the clouds, or the hum of city life died away, we come on patches of green, smiling us a welcome; on trees, too, sprouting forth in beauty, or draped with leaves and flowers nodding to us in a grave and stately way, as if to show that they at least bear no grudge, and are prepared to be friendly in spite of all rebuffs. Ruminating thus, many a lesson have I learned on charity and forgiveness.

Nor are my rambles unromantic, though the scenes are no longer strange. Every house and farm has become familiar to me. I have seen a generation or two of cowboys develop into ploughmen, wed themselves to rosy dairymaids, and go their ways. I have beguiled idle hours in weaving webs of fancy round their married lives, listening for the merry laughter of children in their cottages, and watching for the glad light of love on many a mother's face. And as with men and women so with things. The old castle with its turreted walls and secret passages has furnished me much food for thought. I have recalled in fancy the noble men and fair women who used to tread its halls, their courtly, gallant ways, their feasts and tournaments: and as I stand in the chambers, girt with gray stone and canopied by heaven. I can see the coats of mail still on the walls, and hear through the mist of years the voice of some gay warrior recounting his triumphs in the field. And many a story, too, have I heard from the rustic people about the whole gray house which stands in the hollow among the trees. You see, I am old enough to pat the comely maidens on the shoulder without exciting the ire of their brawny lovers, and to chat, too, with impunity to the buxom matrons in the cottages while their husbands sit smoking by the fireside. And thus it was that I heard the story of the Old House in the Hollow. I had often wondered if it did not contain a secret, so silent was it, so forbidding in aspect, with its old porch black with age, and its windows stained and weather beaten. It looked so grim, that I used to think it, too, must have witnessed deeds of blood, and taken the best way to avoid detection by standing for evermore in gloomy silence. It stood among thick foliage, so thick, that even on a summer day but a stray sunbeam or two rested on its blackened walls, wavering and timorous, as if scared at their bravery in venturing so far. The carriage road from the gate to the door had faded out of sight, and there was nothing around but grass heavy and dark-coloured, with the weeds that grew among it. The woman in the cottage not far off was glad enough to give me the key of the rusty iron gate which admitted to the grounds, and there I used to wander more from curiosity than pleasure. But I always felt morbid under the old trees; and the grass, too, was thick and rank, that it was like walking over deserted graves.

In that old garden, said the villagers, a lady in a white mantle used to walk among the trees, and look with yearning glance towards the windows of the old house. The e I have waited for her, but she never came; for, through habit. I have fallen into believing the stories I hear. Perhaps the sunshine frightened her away; perhaps, from long living in the shades, her eyes had grown too weak to bear the light; perhaps she cared not that strangers should share her grief, and wished to mourn there alone with the darkness for her friend and the winds sighing comfort to her among the trees. Whatever the reason was, I never met her face to face in that gloomy hollow. Yet, although she was so fair and young, the older villagers could not tell her tale without a shudder; and though the lads and lasses laughed aloud, yet it was a wavering uncertain laugh, which died on their lips, and left a silence all the more profound.

Forty years had passed since the oaken door creaked on its hinges to admit the master and his fair young bride; and a year later, it had closed on her as they bore her away to sleep in the churchyard, to the grave that had proved too small for her wandering restless spirit. On that day, cold, and with a drizzling, chilling rain, the small cortege passed through the gate, a man stalking behind, with head bent and eyes cast on the ground, his face calm, but chill and gray as the sky. And if the curious one had turned his eyes on the house he would have seen, at an upper window, a woman's figure, clad in mourning, with head bent, intently watching the pall bearers as they wound along the muddy road. Had the curious one cared to look closer, he might have seen the gleam of triumph in her eyes—dark, flashing, coal-black eyes—as she watched the tall bent figure walk behind with such a weary, listless step But soon a turn in the road hid the company from view, and the window was empty again.

One year had sufficed to darken the brightness of that fair young life. Did it ever strike you, reader, that some men and women seem to have had a sunlight bath before entering this world, so destined are they to make everything around them pure and good; while others, wafted from the regions of gloom, cast all around them the shadow of death? Into this baleful darkness had the young bride fallen, and in it her spirit had been quenched. She loved her husband truly, that tall, bronzed man, who had come from the Indies to woo her in the sunny lanes of her own England. Right glad too, had she been to become mistress of his old home. For months, no spot had come on their home picture. He was happy in his treasure; she, too, in her simple life in the village, where, from her kindness, she already was receiving the homage due to a queen. But one day, when the snow was on the ground and the flowers were dead, a woman came to the Old House in the Hollow. She was dark, and radiantly beautiful with the beauty that blossoms under western skies She neither asked nor received leave to stay as a member of the family circle in the old house, but there was no one to oppose her action. The master was her cousin, she said; and even as she spoke, the gleam in her eyes gave her words the lie. Yet he said nothing, for suddenly he had grown silent and cold, avoiding even the wistful, questioning glances of his wife.

The shadow spread slowly over the house, up the staircases, into the nooks and corners of the rooms, laying its black hand now on this and now on that, but nowhere so strongly as on the heart of the young mistress. Her rippling laughter changed to sighs, her bright smiles were replaced by downcast looks; she passed from summer to winter with no mellowing autumn days to make the change less sad. It was not that the woman who had come so strangely, sought the love of her husband, or in any other way attempted to dispel the sunshine of her life; she simply dwelt with them, nay, was friendly enough at times; but the dark dress which she wore, and the masses of dark hair which at times she would let fall about her shoulders, seemed indicative of the moral cloud which was slowly gathering over their lives. The lily drooped day by day for want of sunlight. She became morbid, nervous, full of strange and wayward fancies. She thought the love of her husband was dead; and she took to dressing herself in her wedding garb, to try if by that strange way she might make it live again. Clad in the soft lustrous satins—in which as a happy bride she had flushed and smiled in the little English church but a few months before—she would pace her room for hours, and stand, too, longingly before the glass peering wistfully to see if aught of her, charm were gone. In this garb, too, she would walk among the old trees, and deck her bosom with the snowdrops of spring: but they seemed to wither away at her touch and hang listless and dead. Thus it was one day she was found sitting among the trees on the fresh spring grass, some faded snowdrops in her lifeless hand, her golden hair surmounting a face darkened with some mysterious presence. A pale gleam of spring sunlight had crept down and settled on her brow; but it was out of place, and timid as the sunbeams which I have seen playing on the old house itself.

Thus quietly as the gliding of a river did her spirit depart, or rather was effaced, as a cloud can hide the silver moon from us for a time. And so, they tell me, she can be seen at times in the old garden, just as, when the clouds grow faint, the welcome shafts of light come down to assure us that the remother orb still lives.

Where Meteors Come From.

If, about 200 years ago, a witness had stated that he had seen a witch at midnight riding through the air on a broomstick, he would have been believed; but if he had stated that he had heard a loud explosion, and found a large hole in the ground, and, upon thrusting his hand in, he had found a stone which was warm, his veracity would have been doubted. Meteors must have fallen in olden times, but it is only in latter days that these cases have been reported. Until 1749 it was the belief that meteors were visitations from God. A Danish astronomer was the first to write on the subject. Pallas found a meteor which the former examined, and recognized its true character, being a composition of iron and nickel. In 1883 a large shower fell in Normandy, which was of meteoric origin. A Hindoo claimed that a meteor followed him for two hours before it fell to the earth. The most celebrated one fell in 1492, in Alsace, and it has hung for three centuries in a cathedral. It weighed 230 pounds, and fell with the sound of a clap of thunder. It penetrated the earth six feet. The best known meteor is one of 1874, which fell in Wolverhampton, Eng. A farmer saw a hole in the ground, and an examination showed the earth to be warm, and a meteor was finally unearthed which weighed about 700 pounds. Being polished, it resembles solid iron, and is now stored in the British Museum. In falling, meteors start from above the atmosphere, where there is little resistance, and come down with a velocity twenty times greater than that of a bullet. Coming in contact with the atmosphere great heat is generated and the meteor is broken in pieces. The most common meteors are stones, and cannot be found because they resemble stones, on the earth's surface. In Siberia and South America the most are found. Where they come from has caused much discussion. One theory is that meteors originally came from the earth, and were due to stupendous volcanic eruptions of ages gone, when the meteors were thrown beyond the attraction of the earth, and sent revolving around the sun. When the earth in its orbit comes near one of there wandering meteors it attracts it, and it plunges into the earth. Any stone thrown at the rate of six miles a second would be thrown outside of its attractive power. Every one of these must in time enter the orbit of the earth and must, of course, return to it.—[Prof. Ball before a Boston audience.

KILLING HER CHILD AND HERSELF.

A Distracted Wife's Last Message to the Man who Had Deserted Her.

In a humble room upon the second floor of a Callowhill street, Philadelphia, boarding house, a mother and child lay down recently and died in each other's arms. Upon the head of Jesse Logan, the recreant husband and father, rests the moral responsibility for the double tragedy. When Mrs. Theodore Seifert, the mistress of the boarding house, arose in the morning and went about her duties, she wondered why her lodgers in the back room slept so late. She did not go to their room until nearly noon. Then she knocked violently and called, but the room was quiet. She put her face to the keyhole. It was stopped with a wad of paper, but she detected the odor of escaping gas.

The door was forced open. The body of Annie Logan was on the bed. She had undressed for the night. Her careworn face was almost as peaceful as though she slept. One arm was outstretched upon the pillow and the other clasped in a tight embrace the body of her baby boy, Howard. The bedroom was scrupulously neat. The clothing of mother and child had been carefully packed away in a trunk, together with some little trinkets. Only a few articles of the child's clothing were in sight. These had been carefully used to seal cracks about the door and window frames. Under the door was tightly wedged a piece of carpet. The gas jet was turned on.

A cup on the washstand was partly filled with laudanum, and a teaspoon redolent with tincture of opium lay upon the floor where Annie Logan had thrown it after giving her child a fatal dose and draining the dregs herself. The forsaken wife had also twisted and knotted a towel about her throat to hasten the work of suffocation. On the bureau were a few rumpled and tear-stained leaves hastily torn from a memorandum book. They contained the story of the woman's shattered life, or as much of the story as the heart-broken wife chose to make public on the night of her death. The first note, hastily written with a pencil found beside it, was addressed to her landlady. It read:

MRS. SEIFERT: You will let my brothers know it as soon as possible. The eldest, Jerome Fegley, lives at 2 418 Reece street, between Fifth and Sixth streets. Thomas Fegley, 2 816 Poplar street, is fireman at Twenty-third and Race streets, with North & Brother.

In the other message, written closely upon five pages, the trembling hand had confessed the motives that had prompted to murder and suicide. The letter was addressed to her family. It read:

DEAR BRETHERS AND SISTERS: My dear husband has forsaken me and his dear little boy that thought there was no one like his papa, and was looking for him every day. I hope he will often think of the best friend he has had for the last six years. I gave up all for him, and I will die for him. I hope he will forgive me for what I have done, and I hope we will soon meet each other in the other world, for I forgive him and still love him, and hope our little boy will. Howard will be three years old the 8th day of next March. Please bury him in my arms. Dear brothers, forgive me. Take care of my trunk and bury me whereever you wish to. Good-bye to all and every one and to our dear papa. To him Howard said the last word.

I have lived as long as I could bear it, for these two weeks I have lived in misery, but before that I was——

Here the writing wavered and stopped in the middle of a sheet.

Six years ago Annie Fegley lived with her parents in Pottsville. Here she first met Jesse Logan, a man considerably her senior. They were married, She was then 24 years old. They came to Philadelphia, where Mrs. Logan's little fortune was soon spent. Then the husband began to neglect her, and finally he left them apparently forever. On the following day Mrs. Logan received a postal card. The husband's brief message was this:

Will not be home again. Kiss Howard for me.

A Sunday Scene in Texas.

A party of hunters returning from a trip on the plains captured, eleven miles from Colorado City, Texas, a huge black bear, weighing, in his half-famished condition, about 300 pounds. For days he would neither eat nor sleep, and kept the curious at respectful distance, as he paced uneasily to and fro the length of his chain, rolling his blood-shot eyes and giving vent to his rage and fear in snarling, menacing growls. On Sunday morning as the church bells were calling the children from all directions to Sabbath School, brain waxed desperate, and, with a powerful tug, snapped the chain that held him, and was off on a clumsy gallop through town. A great hue and cry was raised, and pursuit made. Bruin, thus hard beset, and having long fasted, made a break for a large-paned window in the dining-room of the Rendrebrook Hotel, landing with a crash in the midst of the astonished guests, who "stood not upon the order of their going, but went at once." Amid the clang and clatter bruin placed himself at bay in a corner, unconsciously, but undeniably, "monarch of all he surveyed."

Brief, however, was his reign. Soon a cowboy entering the long hall, threw a lasso over his shoulders; a second and third followed, and the great angry brute was dragged into the street. Then a lively skirmish followed, causing a general stampede of the crowd, the three cowboys endeavoring to mount their plunging, bucking, frightened ponies, who evidently did not like his fellowship. The feat was accomplished, however, and then came the "tug of war"—the harassed brute, fairly at bay, lunged to the right and left, while the ponies, with feet spread, bracing sturdily against the tremendous strains of the lariats wound about the saddle horns, were with their riders dragged hither and thither over the hard, smooth ground. A girth snapped, and a saddle went spinning over the horse's head, leaving the nimble rider astride the neck of the snorting equine.

But the war was unequal, and Bruin at length, utterly spent, surrendered, and sullenly allowed himself to be led off towards the Zoo in the park. Crossing the Lone Wall Creek, "Ursa Major's" spirit utterly failed him, and he laid him down in the shallow water and gave up the ghost.

The plumber may not be a musician, but he often plays on the pipes.

The Prayer Barrel.

I first met with prayer barrels on the borders of Thibet, when travelling the narrow paths which wind along the face of majestic, precipitous Himalayan crags, we met native travellers from still further north—traders driving flocks of laden goats, women with quaint headdresses of lumps of amber and large, coarse turquoises fastened on bands of dirty cloth, and here and there a man holding in his hand a small bronze or brass cylinder which he twirled mechanically all the time he was journeying. It was some time before I succeeded in getting hold of one of these for a closer examination, as the owners are nervously afraid to trust their treasures in the hands of one who, albeit in ignorance, might irreverently turn them the wrong way, and so undue much of the merit acquired by perpetual twirling in the opposite direction. For, as we eventually discovered, not only is the sacred six-syllabled charm embossed on the metal cylinder, but the same mystic words were written over and over again on very lengthy strips of cloth or papyrus, which are bound round the spindle on which the cylinder rotates, and one end of which forms the handle. It is therefore necessary to turn this little barrel of prayers in such a direction that the characters forming the holy phrase may pass in proper order before the person turning, and as all Oriental books are read from the right side of each page to the left, the barrel is turned in the same direction. For the same reason the Thibetan walks in this direction round the great terraces and other buildings, on which the holy words are inscribed, in order that his eyes may rest on the words in due course, which can only be the case when he keeps his left hand toward the object round which he is walking. Happily this produces a doubly satisfactorily result, for in Eastern lands, as well as in our own West, it has ever been accounted lucky and meritorious to walk round sacred objects or places in this sunwise course—an act of homage to the sun which I have seen rendered in many lands. Just as our British ancestors continued thus to circumambulate their churches long after they had nominally abandoned all paganism, so throughout the world we find survivals of the old homage. —[The Contemporary Review.

Carving Ivory and Bone.

All the curiously carved handles which are so fashionable, and the quainter that are sought after, are shaped upon a series of rapidly revolving wheels, ranging from an eighth to three inches in diameter, and which are a cross between a file and a saw upon their cutting surface. Ivory and bone are carved in precisely the same manner, the only difference in the handling of the two being that bone has to be boiled a long while to free it from animal matter before it goes to the carver, while ivory is clean and pure from the start.

When it is desired to produce any object in bone or ivory, an umbrella handle with a crouched tiger upon it for instance, the carver takes a piece of the material of suitable size, and presses it upon one of the wheels described above. At the point of contact it cuts with amazing rapidity. Soon the shapeless block begins to assume the rough outlines of the object intended. The lathe is then stopped, which requires but an instant and another, probably a smaller wheel, is substituted. In this way a dozen wheels may be used before the final finish is given with a delicate disc, a little larger than a pin's head; but when the work leaves the deft fingers, of the skilful worker a perfect miniature of the royal native of the jungle is seen. The only remaining thing to be done polishing, which is accomplished by means of canvas belts with pumice upon them; and finally, by canton flannel belts or wheels.

Many people suppose that billiard balls are turned by means of some exquisitely adjusted machinery in order to secure their spherical perfection. The exquisite machinery is the eye and hand of the artisan. The writer saw a gray-haired workman turn several billiard balls, and the only tool he used was an ordinary turner's chisel. His eye was his gauge.

The Drunkard's Toughness.

In his "Scrambles Among the High Alps" Leslie Stephen tells the story of a guide who while drunk fell over a precipice so deep that a fall over it seemed almost certain death, and yet sustained little injury. Stephen accordingly gives his readers the advice either not to fall over a precipice or to get thoroughly drunk before doing so. I myself once saw a man who had thrown himself while drunk over the Dean bridge, in Edinburgh, a height of about 200 feet, on to the rocky bed of the stream below. A sober man would probable have been instantly killed, but this individual though he had broken both of his thigh bones, quickly recovered. The reason of this immunity probably is that the nerve centers, which regulate the heart and vessels, are so much paralized in the drunken man as not to be affected by the fall, which in a sober man would have acted on them so violently as to stop the heart, arrest circulation and cause instant death.

The Pie-Eater and the Lunchman.

The other day a newspaper man, en route from Columbus to his home in Cincinnati in search of a clean shirt, might have been seen munching a piece of pie at the lunch counter of the depot at Xenia. The pie-eater observed to the lunchman:

"I notice that this piece of pie is below the regulation size."

"Well," was the reply, "the fact is, I am a little short on pies this morning, and I had to make a draft on the transfer pies. The truth of the matter is, I sell a piece of pie to a railroad employe or transfer hand for 5 cents and I charge passengers 10 cents. I cut a passenger pie into three pieces and get thereby 30 cents for a pie. The transfer pies are cut into four pieces, and I get 20 cents for the pie from the transfer hands. You just ate a piece of transfer pie. Ten cents, please."

"If a passenger happens to get served with a hunk of transfer pie he has to pay regular passenger rates, eh?"

"Correct again."

"Suppose the transfer pies should run out and the passenger pies had to be served to the railroad employes, what rate would they pay?"

"There goes your train, sir."

There is a great deal of flash literature coming over the wires nowadays, yet no one attemps to suppress it.

RUSSIA'S GREAT CORN PORT.

A Commercial Mart on the Black Sea and its Characteristic Features.

There are some towns, as there are some faces, upon which the lapse of years seem to leave no trace, and the great corn port of Russia is one of them. Its bombardment by the combined fleets of France and England in 1854 might almost be considered a blessing in disguise, as tending to break, if even only for a time, its deadly uniformity, but even setting it on fire did it no permanent good. The streets are just as straight; the butter-colored houses just as yellow, the dust clouds just as stifling, the surroundings just as outrageously modern as when I was last here in 1873. One change, indeed is apparent, viz: That the names of the principal streets, formerly written in Russian and Italian, now appear in Russian alone. But in all other points Odessa is Odessa still, The statues "after the antique" are so long after it that it has forgotten all about them. The gaunt, scraggy church towers look like overgrown coffee pots, and all the larger buildings are so exactly alike that I am in hourly expectation of seeing a newly-arrived tourist swagger into the town hall or the public library, instead of his hotel, shouting to the astounded custodian to "trot out the bill of fare."

But this universal unprogressiveness is merely the natural and inevitable result of the peculiar temperament which characterizes the Slavonian race. Paradoxical as the assertion may appear, there is not enough discontent in Russia. There is, indeed, misery enough and far too much; but, instead of being thereby goaded into advancing, the sole idea of the suffering masses is to endure doggedly until the evil day is passed, and then to jog on in the old ruts after the old fashion. The Finn still inhabits the same log hut, wears the same shoes of twisted bark, feeds upon the same dried bread and fish mixed with sawdust, which served his forefathers in the days of Peter the Great. The Russian peasant, in an age of railways and telegraphs, is still the same careless, hospitable, thievish, drunken, good humored savage that he was two centuries ago. The Tartars of the Crimea burrowing like rabbits amid the ruins of Chersonesus or in the caverns of the Inkerman valley, will tell you, as they told Mr. Kinglake, in October 1854, that they are content because they lived happily under the czars for three generations. It is not from such material as this that great nations are wrought. The sheep-skin frocked philosopher of the steppes, a conservative by nature and a fatalist by creed, accepts without a murmur the coarse fare and log-built hovel which served his ancestors in the middle ages, content to remain as his father was before him, and as his son will be after him. To offer civilization to such a race is like reading poetry to an oyster.

But however morally backward she may be, the great empire has visibly advanced in a material sense since the day when I saw all Moscow mourning for "the good czarina" four years ago. If railways are indeed, as the well-known saying declares, the "true civilizers of mankind," she has constructed enough of them lately. Apart from the famous military railroad from the eastern shore of the Caspian eastward across the Khiva desert—which has just received a fresh extension whereof I shall have more to say before long, the whole southeast of European Russia is now being opened up in all directions. The prolongation of the Poti-Tiflis, railroad to Bakua and the new petroleum fields has at last connected the Black Sea with the Isolated Caspian. Along the northern slope of the Caucasus, another line, running southeastward from the point where the Don pours into the sea of Azof, is already open as far as Vladkavkaz, at the foot of the great central ridge, and working its way slowly among the mighty precipices of the Dariel Pass and Mount Kasbek to join the trans Caucasian track at Tiflis, and link the border provinces with the interior of Russia. From the Ponti Tiflis line a branch has been run out to Russia's new port, Batoum, ceded by Turkey in 1878 and a "Caspian coast railroad" is now being projected, which is to run southward into Persia along the western shore of the great lake, although Persia herself seems in no special hurry to accept the benefit.

It is an unspeakble relief to find one's self once more, after so many days among the unintelligible dialects of Hungary, Transylvania and Roumania, in a country where one can understand every word that is said When I first heard Russian spoken a few days ago at the frontier station of Umgheni, it was like the first glimpse of the minarets of Bagdad to a traveller on the plains of Mesopotamia. But to any one who does not understand it, the grand old Slavonian tongue must have a somewhat startling sound. The Russian word for "Thank you" is pronounced exactly like "Blackguard are you," while the phrase for "Pass me the salt"—viz: "Dai myne sol," is, as any one will see who pronounces it quickly, suggestive of a very unorthodox remark indeed. The formidable length of some of the words, too, reminds one of the king of Kamboja's title, which required three men and a boy to recite it.

All that I have said regarding the unprogressiveness of Odessa might as justly be retorted by Odessa upon us, for just at present our progress has come to a standstill altogether. My draft upon the Odessa bank, for some mysterious reason quite beyond the comprehension of any benighted gentile who has not graduated upon the stock exchange, cannot be cashed without some further commercial hocus-pocus, which I have just telegraphed to St. Petersburg to obtain. Meanwhile we were stranded here, with the satisfaction of seeing the steamer that should have carried us to Sebastapol going quietly off without us. Nor is this all. Our total wealth in the currency of the realm being exactly 25 Russian kopecks, (about 15 cents,) we may well feel like embodied frauds in one of the best hotels in Odessa. Every dish that I order makes me feel as if I had picked some one's pocket, and the mere presence of a waiter acts upon my nerves very much as that of a detective might act upon those of a suspected burglar or murderer.

M. Edouard Detaille, the well-known French painter, who has been studying the most characteristic types of the Russian soldier at the recent manœuvres at Krasnoe-Selot, found himself exceptionally favored by the Commander-in-Chief. He was lodged in the palace, and every facility given him to master his subject. He has returned to France with a great number of designs and sketches to be worked up into a great battle piece hereafter.

INTO THE JAWS OF DEATH.

A Charge that Amazed the World Thirty Years Ago.

It was thirty years ago, on the 25th of October, that the Earl of Cardigan's light brigade made the famous charge at Balaklava, near Sebastopol. A gentleman who was on the staff of an English General, and who witnessed the charge, gives this description of it:

"On Oct. 25, 1854, our eyes turned to the heights of Balaklava, on the possession of which depended the very existence of the allied forces. On that day the Russians made a desperate attack on our lines, to be as desperately repulsed. Word was sent to headquarters that the enemy, under cover of a heavy fire from the forts, had left Sebastopol in force and was massing himself so as to threaten the safety of the heights. and with our Mohammedan allies the word was sauve qui peut. The heavy cavalry on the right and the light brigade on the left were advanced, with the artillery in the centre playing a game at long bowls. Meanwhile a Russian battery was ostentatiously moved forward, whose well-served guns promised to be emberrassing.

"Lord Raglan, who did not know the full strength of the foe, saw that this obstacle must be removed; but whether or not he also foresaw the necessity of first looking before the leap was taken must be forever a mystery. The commanders of the cavalry brigades, Lords Lucan and Cardigan, brothers-in-law, between whom no love was lost, were waiting the word to engage, Lord Lucan being the senior officer. To them sped Capt. Nolan, a dashing hussar. Saluting the General, he said he bore an order —unwritten—from Lord Raglan that the battery must be silenced and the guns captured. Lord Lucan, a man so cautious as to have earned the nickname 'Lord Look-on,' fearing to expose his small force to any ambushed dangers, asked for more definite orders. With a slightly contemptuous turn of his handsome lip, the aide-de-camp pointed in the direction of the battery and said:

NEWSPAPER FABLES,

The Editor of a Country Paper one day turned on the Office Towel, which was Hanging on its Accustomed Nail, and began a Tirade of Abuse on its Appearance, terming it Dirty, Unfit, Ill-looking, and fit only to be Flung out of the Window.

"While I am compelled to plead guilty to all Charges," humbly Responded the Towel, "You must Remember that your own Hands have helped to Soil me and make me what I am."

A DOMESTIC ROW.

One morning the Washington Hand-Press in a Printing Office suddenly flew its Frisket and called out in a loud voice:

"Hear ye! hear ye! But for me the Banner could not be issued each week!"

"Just hear that!" sneered a Case of Burgeois over by the Window. "Where would be the Paper but for its type?"

"And they never Printed a Paper yet without Ink," added the Roller in a Glue and Molasses voice.

"Well, I don't want to Appear Egotistical," observed a Bundle of White paper lying on the floor, "but if you knew how hard it was for the Editor to raise the Cash to buy me, you'd Imagine I was of some little Account Around here."

"Gentlemen," added the Imposing Stone in marble voice, "I don't claim to own all the corner lots in Town, but if the Chases, Shooting-Stick, Mallet, Quoins and myself were to go off on a Picnic I'd like to see the Banner go to press—I would!"

The Gordon Jobber, Box Stove and several of the Galleys were getting ready to chip in when the Editor entered and asked the cause of the Row. The matter was explained by the Card Cutter in a Calm and Unbiassed manner, and the Editor replied:

"Each and every one of you are valued in your Respective Places, and all combined go to help issue the Leading Newspaper of this country—circulation (when a circus agent comes along) 6,000 copies—Wood Received on Subscription, as Heretofore."

The Astonished and Delighted Editor sent out for a Bed-cord to Measure the Length and Diameter of the Egg presented the Farmer with a Year's Subscription, and took Voluminous Notes with a Pencil. The next issue of Gazette contained a full and Thrilling Description of the Egg and the Pullet, and wound up by saying that Farmer Johnson was Honest, Upright, Enterprising and Progressive, and that he had the Loveliest Family, the best Farm and the Fattest Live Stock of any Agriculturist in the State. All of which so Tickled the Farmer that he carried a Grin until the Weather Wore the Enamel off his front teeth, and he had no Trouble in Marrying of his Daughters, Selling off his Old Hay, and getting Elected as Supervisor.

Six Hours Without a Memory.

The brain plays odd tricks with us at times, especially when it has been subjected to a sudden shock; and scientific men who think that its various convolutions are the seats of various faculties of the mind derive some confirmation of their theory from the fact that the power of memory may fail in part without any failure of intelligence, and may fail in part without being altogether impaired. A notable instance of this last mentioned peculiarity occurred about a dozen years ago. A lad in the country was accused of throwing another into a pond, and he was put on his trial before a bench of magistrates. His elder brother who bore a high character in the village both for conduct and for mental shrewdness, had seen the previous struggle between the lads, and he was called to give evidence. He declared his belief that the fight was perfectly fair throughout, and that the immersion in the pond was an accident. Questioned as to what took place afterward, he could not speak to a single circumstance. "Did the prisoner attempt to rescue the deceased?" the Chairman asked him. He could not say. "The bench understand that you leaped into the water and recovered the body." "They tell me so," he said, "but I have no recollection of it." "The constable has told us that you dived twice, brought out the body, and carried it to the parents' house." "I have not the slightest remembrance. I only know that I was at home in bed at 8 o'clock" —six hours later—"and the last thing I could remember was seeing poor Smith fall over the edge." There could be no doubt that the witness was speaking the truth; and he could have had no object in doing otherwise. The shock which he had received on seeing the fatal result of his brother's quarrel had paralyzed his brain; the memory was interrupted by those few hours, though in all other respects he acted like a man in the full possession of his senses.—[Boston Traveller.

Age Cannot Wither.

Lord Lindsay states that in the course of his wanderings amid the pyramids of Egypt he stumbled on a mummy which proved by its hieroglyphics to be at least 2,000 years old. In examining it after it was unwrapped he found in one of its closed hands a tuberous or bulbous root. He was interested in the question how long vegetable life could last, and took the root from the mummy's hand and planted it in a sunny soil, allowing the rains and dews of Heaven to descend upon it, and in the course of a few weeks the root bust forth and bloomed into a most beautiful dahlia. The story is said to be well verified.

An Extraordinary French Murder Case.

Paris is at present stirred to its depths by the revelations made respecting the career of Pel, the poisoner of Moutreuil. Pel is now at Mazas, on a charge of having made away with his servant, a woman named Marie Boehmer. He is also charged with having poisoned his first wife. M Kuehn, the chief of the investigation department, is busily engaged at Montreuil in following up any clues which may bring the murder of the servant home to the accused. Two boxes which belonged to the missing woman were found to contain a napkin, which bore the imprint of a blood-stained knife. A large dinner knife has come to light, supposed to be the instrument with which Pel cut the flesh off the bones of his victim before burning it by some of the chemical processes in which he is an adept. It is thought that the victim's remains were placed in the closet, as Pel had been observed to make frequent visits there on three successive days in July last. This is somewhat borne out by the fact that when the cess-pools were dranned to-day portions of human intestines were found.

Pel is a clockmaker by trade, and was married in 1880 to a young woman named Boffreau, employed in a shop near the Champs Elysees. Two months after the marriage Pel's wife died in intense agony. She was hastily buried in the Montmartre Cemetery, but her remains are about to be exhumed by order of the Procureur of the Republic.

A year afterward Pel married a Mlle. de Murat, who is still alive. Pel denied that he had been married to his first wife, but M. Kuehn confronted him with his brother-in-law, and he then admitted the marriage.

M Kuehn has made a minute examination with a microscope of Pel's house at Montreuil, and in the interstices of the floor has found living organisms such as exist only in putrefying blood. When Pel arrived in Montreuil from Nanterre, where he ran away from his second wife and his creditors in July last, he was accompanied by the servant Marie Boehmer, who, it is said, was formerly a lay sister in a convent and afterward a milkseller in the Rue St Denis She entrusted a large share of her savings to the care of Pel, and about three months ago suddenly disappeared.

Pel, in answer to various inquiries, said he had sent her to the hospital. The neighbors, however, assert that one night, about the time of Boehmer's disappearance, a great fire was visible in Pel's house, and that the air around was infected by an offensive odor. In an adjacent sewer some human hair has lately been discovered, and it is in this direction, as well as in the closet, that Kuehn made his principal investigations today. Pel will probably be brought face to face with his second wife to-morrow.

It is not long since the mother of the alleged poisoner was killed by an electric battery made by her son. Pel is in a very despondent conditien at Mazas, and has not partaken of much food during the past two days. A mottom or associate has been placed with him as it was feared that he was about to commit suicide; and possibly the accused clockmaker may make some statement to this person.—[London Telegraph.

Effect of Paper and Ink on Eyesight.

The colors of paper and ink, says a writer in the Scientific Monthly, are far more responsible for defective eyesight than cross-lights from opposite windows, light shining directly in the face, insufficient light, or small type. If these were removed the principal cause of the mischief would still remain, the real root of the evil being the universally used black ink and white paper. These, says the writer in question, are ruining the eyesight of the reading nations. He argues that the rays of the sun are reflected by a white body, and absorbed by a black one, and that we print our newspapers and books in direct opposition to the plainest correct principles of optical science. A book or newspaper as now printed being read by us, the eyes do not see the letters, which, being black, are non-reflective the outlines of the impressions of the type reach the retina, but they are not received by the spontaneous, direct action of that organ. The white surface of the paper is reflected, but the letters are detected only by a descriminative effort of the optic nerves. This constant labor irritates the nerves, and, when long continued, exhausts their susceptibility. As proofs, the writer cites the well-known fact that the human eye cannot long sustain the glare of a white surface without injury. The sunlight reflected from fields of snow; unrelieved by the colors of other objects, or from the white sands of the desert, is, the world over, productive of ophthalmia.

In accordance with this argument; if colored paper were substituted for white the eyes of all reading people would at once be relieved of a blinding strain—a continuous effort bound to result in permanent weakening of the eyes. Nature and science, says the writer above quoted, tell us that the color of all printing paper should be green. Green grass covers the ground green leaves are on the trees and green is the color most grateful to the eye.

Green newspapers would be a novelty, but in time we should grow accustomed to tint: green school books would please the children: but green grounds would sadly mar the high art engravings for which a number of American magazines have become noted. And, if our scientific friend is correct in his conclusions, green paper would sadly cripple the trade in eye-glasses and spectacles.

Dispensing with Bridesmaids

There has been a great deal of talk lately among the fashionables as to whether it is the correct thing for a bride to be attended to the altar by a string of fair bridesmaids, and also if the uncompromising black coat of the usher should be longer permitted to obstruct the view. There certainly has been a tendency displayed in recent marriages in Philadelphia to dispense with bridesmaids, and several reasons have been given by the brides. A pertinent one is that it is such an expense to a girl to find a handsome dress, which, as a rule, can only be worn on one occasion—at the wedding. A bridesmaid's frock is seldom of any use as a ball dress, and anybody who has noticed the picturesque group of maidens who follow after the ushers would hardly care to see young ladies attired in that fashion on the streets.—[Philadelphia Press.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber lnd, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in the valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

Fall Assizes.

The Fall Assizes for this County opened on Tuesday, the 4th inst., Hon. Justice Armour presidmg. The criminal calender is an unusually heavy one, including one murder case, one of manslaughter, two of robbery, one of larceny, one of false pretences. There are also twenty-two civil cases on the list. Mr. A. Frost conducted the criminal business on behalf of the crown.

The following is a list of the Grand Jurors:

John Thompson, Foreman; David Beattie, R. H. Bull, Robert Shannon, N. Dunsmore, John Gillies, Wm. Fawcett, Alex. Beaton, John D. Montgomery, Jas. Campbell, Alex. Mercer, Joseph Maxwell, Thos. Bowie Wm. Walker. Geo. S. Bowes. R. P. Butchart, W. Wilde, John Sword, R. A. Stark, H. Palmer, John Ashley, Charles Burns.

The following cases were disposed of:—

NEILSON vs. PARKINSON.—A case of ejectment from premises in Manitowaning. Judgment reserved. James Mason for plaintiff; Mr. Walker of Hamilton for defendant.

BAXTER vs SUTHERLAND, et al.—The plaintiff was agent to purchase ties on Manitoulin Island for defendants James Sutherland and Joseph Maughan, and this action was brought to recover a ballance of salary alleged to be due, but which defendants disputed. Judgment reserved. Jas. Mason for plaintiff; Jno. Creasor, Q. C., for defendant Sutherland, J. M. Kilbourn for defendant Maughan.

The Grand Jury brought in a true bill against Wm Scones for murder.

GIBBONS vs. ROOLEY.—This action exposed the queer doings of a J. P. on the Manitoulin Island. It appeared that a Mr. Miller owned a wharf at Little Current, and arranged with a farmer named Rooley to bring him some timber to repair it. When the timber was delivered, he condemed a couple of the sticks, but they lay for some months with the others. In the meantime Miller became insolvent, and the asignee sold the dock to Mr. Gibbons, a merchant there, undertaking to repair it before giving possession. He took the timber that was there, thinking it all belonged to the estate, and repaired the dock, Mr. Gibbons being away from home and having nothing to do with it. About a month after, Rooley (apparently encouraged with the local magistrate,) had Gibbons arrested on a charge of stealing his timber, and brought before Sims, J. P., who adjourned the case and put him in the lock-up for five days, without a shadow of testimony that Gibbons had been guilty of anything. At the final hearing he had to be discharged, as there was absolutely nothing against him. He now brought this action against Rooley for malicious arrest. The jury brought in a verdict of $1200 damages. Creasor & Platt for plaintiff; Jas. Mason for defendant.

WEDNESDAY.

QUEEN vs. COOK TEETS.—The trial of Cook Teets, the blind man of Artemesia, on a charge of poisoning his wife last fall, was commenced on Wednesday morning, and had not been concluded as we went to press. Mr. A. Frost was for the prosecution, and Mr. J. Mason defended the prisoner. We will give a report of trial next week.

The Grand Jury returned "No Bill" against Finlay MacRae for false pretences.—O. S. Times.

THE GREAT HORSE BREEDING ESTABLISHMENT OF AMERICA.—One of the many wonderful enterprises the great West is noted for and one which none favored with opportunity should miss seeing, is the great breeding establishment of "Oaklawn," owned by M. W. Dunham, at Wayne, Ill., 35 miles from Chicago. His importations of Percheron horses from France to date, have aggregated the immense sum of $3,000,000, and at the present time at "Oaklawn," 500 head of the choicest specimens of that race, nearly all recorded with their pedigrees in the Percheron Stud Book of France, can be seen, while on their Colorado ranges are 2,000 mares and 52 imported Percheron stallions in breeding. 118.

C. P. R. Exhibition.

According to notice in the STANDARD, as well as by posters, a car containing samples of produce from the C. P. R. experimental farms, and other portions of the North West, was at Markdale station on Wednesday in order to give the citizens of our village and surrounding district an opportunity of seeing, without any expense, a sample of the products and soil of the Canadian North West.

The car has been fitted up for the purpose, and is well filled, and tastefully arranged with various samples of wheat, oats, barley, peas, timothy seed, flax, corn, turnips, potatoes, mangle wurtzel, beets, citrons, celery, 94 lb squash, cabbage, kohl rabbi, tomatoes, onions, wild hops, wild vetches, &c., &c. The sections are chiefly taken from the C. P. R. experimental farms; there are ten of those farme located along the line of the C. P. R. about fourty miles apart the nearest one to Winnipeg being 443 miles west while the farthest one is 785 miles distant. The grain is shown both in the sheaf and in the bag, and is a very creditable exhibit, while the roots and vegetables (especially the latter) were indeed remarkable for size and quality, twenty one varities of potatoes from one farm, grown by S. J. Jackson, M. P. P.. for Stonewall, was in itself a creditable exhibit in that line. Flax is now extensively and successively cultivated from which oil cake and linceed oil is manufactured in Winnipeg. The exhibit proved very interesting and will certainly have the effect of raising the country in the estimation of those who see the display, we would judge that over four hundred took in the show here on Wednesday, and all appeared highly pleased with what they saw, the gentlemen in charge of the car were corteous, and anxious to give all necessary information. Those who did not see the exhibit missed a rare treat.

HAIR-BREADTH ESCAPE.—What narrowily escaped being a fatal gun accident occurred a few miles east of this village some days ago. It appears two men, Wm. Love and F. Thompson, were out practicing with firearms shooting at a mark, when a little daughter of Edward Ross's on her way home from school, and not observed by the parties firing, a stray bullet struck her on the back of the head, passed up over the centre of the scalp and out through her hat, just grazing the skin on the head. The little girl was more frightened than hurt, and made her home as quickly as possible when she was taken by her mother (who thought the ball had gone through the child's head) to the residence of Mr Jas. Love, who carefully examined and dressed the girl's head, and at once was enabled to camfort the mother by assuring her that her girl was not seriously injured. We would cry, caution! caution!! to all using such dangerous weapons.

ANOTHER COUPLE MADE HAPPY.—The residence of Mr. Wm. Wright, merchant in this village, was the scene of a pleasant gathering on Wednesday morning, the 5th inst., on the occasion of his daughter Mary Ellen's marriage to Mr. Ed. VanDusen of this place. The presents were numerous and well chosen. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rev. A. Wilson, of Markdale. The happy couple left for their honey moon trip by the C. P. R. railway at 11 a. m. with the best wishes of their many friends.

DARING ROBBERY.—On Monday forenoon last the residence of Mr. Israel Boyce, 4th line, Artemesia, was entered by some unknown man to the little girl of about 12 years old, who was in the house alone. Mr. and Mrs. Boyce being away from home, he demanded of the little girl to tell him where Mr. Boyce's money was; if she did not he would shoot her. The child tried to escape from the house, but was followed and further threatened by her captor. The thief succeeded in getting something over $20 in cash.

Mr. Wilmot Pickle, who has been dealing largely in cattle this season, had, some nights ago, either strayed or stolen from his yard thirteen head of cattle. Since, six have been found up to the time of writing. There are seven still missing.

Monday last, fair day here was a busy day for the business men in town. There was a large number of bovines on the market, and changed hands at good prices.

Thursday last (Thanksgiving day) was a general holiday in this village. Business was suspended. Services were conducted in the Methodist and Presbyterian churches morning and afternoon.

NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER IX.

Lady Jesmond went at once to the head of the table, taking her place there as though it had been her custom for years. She smiled and nodded familiarly at me as she took her seat, but made no remark. She talked gaily and brilliantly during dinner, and did not seem at all conscious of being in a strange position; nor did she appear to realise that her coming could have caused me any pain. She spoke without constraint, and evidently had nothing to conceal. She looked round the luxuriously-appointed dinner-table with undisguised satisfaction.

"It seems a strange turn of fate that has brought me here," she said, "and made me mistress of all this wealth pro tem."

"You can scarcely call it 'pro tem.,'" said Mr. Benson. "Your son is a long way from his twenty-first birthday. How old is he now?"

"He will be two years old in September," she replied; "so that I shall be queen regent for almost twenty-years. I shall heartily enjoy my regency in this delightful spot."

I looked at Mr. Benson, and he at me. The words struck me as exceedingly strange, for it is not often that one hears a young widow speak of the years she must pass without the society of her husband as enjoyable ones.

"Did my cousin Paul talk much about Jesmond Dene?" I asked her.

"Not very much," she replied,

"Did he seem angry with Sir William?" asked Mr. Benson.

"No, not angry—that is not the word," she answered quickly. "He was vexed at what he considered his meanness."

"It was strange that Captain Jesmond made no allusion to his marriage," remarked Mr Benson.

Lady Jesmond laughed, giving her head a dainty little toss at the same time,

"I do not think so," she answered. "I had no fortune, and all Sir William's letters to his son on the subject of matrimony began and ended with the one piece of advice—he must marry some one with money. Unluckily I had none."

"You could not expect to monopolise all the good gifts of this world," said the lawyer politely.

She laughed; and truly her laugh was like a silvery chime.

"Paul said he should never write to Sir William about his marriage, but, when he could get leave of absence, he should bring me home. He had an idea that I was quite irresistible, and that Sir William had only to see me to love me," said Lady Jesmond, looking into the lawyer's face with an expression which fairly bewildered that good man. "What do you think Mr. Benson? Would Sir William have liked me?" she asked ingenuously.

"I am afraid he liked nothing but gold," the lawyer answered.

She laughed merrily, disclosing as she did so her even pearly white teeth.

"I had no idea," she remarked presently, "that Jesmond Dene was so extensive, or that Sir William was so rich. Paul spoke of him as a wealthy man; but I did not think he had such unbounded wealth."

"It is a pleasant surprise," said Mr. Benson.

"Very pleasant," replied Lady Jesmond, with a bright little laugh. "When one has suffered all one's life as I have for want of money, such a surprise is, I can assure you, fully appreciated."

I liked her better after these outspoken expressions. She was evidently not in the least ashamed of having been poor.

"More than half the world live in misery from want of money," she continued. "My parents were comparatively poor, and I had to leave home when I was quite a girl to earn my own living."

Mr. Benson ventured to suggest that early contact with the world helped to form and brace the character

"If it be so, I have had a long experience," she said laughingly, "for I began to teach when I was very young."

No certainly she had no false pride. I had never heard any one speak more openly, and I liked her for it.

When dinner was over, we left Mr. Benson with his bottle of favorite old port, and returned to the drawing-room. Lady Jesmond appeared absorbed in deep thought, and it was only when I was about to leave the room to visit Aunt Annette that she broke the silence.

"Stay with me, will you, Miss Gordon?" she said. "I feel lonely and strange to-night."

"Ah then," I thought to myself, "she is not devoid of feeling; but her strong will keeps the emotional side of her nature hidden from the world!"

"I will stay with pleasure if you desire it," I answered.

She crossed the room, and came over to where I was standing. How well I remember the scene! The sun had set and the lovely landscape was shrouded as by a misty veil. The French windows were wide open, and the perfume borne on the evening air filled the room.

"What a fair sweet night!" I remarked.

She looked calmly from the window; there was no admiration in her eyes.

"It is well enough," she said; and then, laying her hands on my shoulders, and looking down—for she was taller than I—into my face, she added slowly, "Miss Gordon you have great reason to hate me and my little son."

"I have no reason to entertain any such feeling towards you or the child," I replied half indignantly.

"How long have you been here?" she asked.

"I came at the beginning of February," I answered.

"Time enough for you to grow deeply attached to Jesmond Dene," she remarked in slow measured tones.

"I love it with all my heart," I confessed.

"You have grown accustomed to receiving a large income—to doing what you liked with vast sums of money?"

"I was not long in learning the lesson," I answered with a smile.

"Mr. Benson tells me that you have begun many improvements on the estate—that you are building schools, an hospital and almshouses."

"It is true, Lady Jesmond."

"He tells me also that you are already a model lady of the manor.

"He is very kind to say so," I answered with a glow of pride at the thought that my humble endeavors had been appreciated.

"Do you know, Miss Gordon," she said, drawing nearer to me, "I am exceedingly sorry? Not sorry that my son will succeed to what you have looked upon as your inheritance; but I am truly grieved because of the great loss you have sustained."

She spoke so kindly that my heart was touched.

"It is," I admitted, "a great loss. Still I have no right to complain of the course events have taken. It is right that Paul's son should inherit what is legally his. I do not see that any one is to blame."

"You might have been spared the pain of all this had more care been exercised by those whose duty it was to make the fullest inquiries," she said.

"Yes; but I shall not give up all hope and pleasure in life because I have lost Jesmond Dene."

She looked at me earnestly—so earnestly that I could not be offended when she said—

"You are beautiful enough to marry well."

"I shall not redeem my fallen fortunes by marriage," I answered; but my heart throbbed wildly and my face flushed as I spoke. Marriage meant love, love meant Nello; and again the music of the nightingales seemed to ring in my ears, and I heard him whisper "Felicia."

"Well, said Lady Jesmond, "we won't speculate as to what might have been, but will confine ourselves to the stern reality of what is. I thought when I came here that you would be my bitterest enemy, that you might possibly contest my claim"

"No one could contest your claim who had looked into little Guy's face." I replied, "for he is the very image of Paul."

"Still it was in your power to make things very disagreeable," she continued. "You might have given me much trouble; but you have yielded at once so generously, so gracefully, so kindly, and I may add, so nobly that I cannot help saying that I am deeply grateful to you for my son's sake. I thank you, Miss Gordon. And now I want to ask a favour of you. Will you stay here at Jesmond Dene with me—for a year at the very least? I do not know what your plans for the future may be; but this I promise you—you shall not leave Jesmond Dene without a handsome dowry. Before anything is settled, give me the promise that you will remain with me for one year—not as mistress of the house, but as my companion and helpmate. You say you loved your cousin Paul—promise me for his sake."

"Will you tell me why you require that promise, why you desire me to stay with you, Lady Jesmond?"

"Yes, as frankly as you ask. I am a stranger here, and shall feel lonely. The position is new to me, and I do not quite know how to fill it. I should be glad to learn from you if you will teach me. I am not accustomed to the management of a large household, and I am not sure even whether I understand what is and what is not etiquette in England. Will you stay and teach me?"

In response to her earnest pleading eyes, I promised, not that I would remain with her for a year, but that I would stay as long as I could.

"So much may happen in a year," I thought to myself; I would not promise for a year.

CHAPTER X.

On the following morning Lady Jesmond asked me to show her over the house. It was still early when we went through all the suites of luxuriously furnished rooms.

"I had no idea the place was so large," she said time after time; and the more she saw of it the more serious she grew. "What a place to lose and to win!" she murmured. "How could Paul leave such a home?" she added wonderingly.

"He preferred independence to luxury," I answered.

Then from the lawn I pointed out to her all the beauties of Jesmond Dene—the restless sea in the distance; the fragrant pine-forest; the shady woods; the clear deep river; the fertile meadow-lands—ah, and even the steep green hill from which I had surveyed the smiling landscape, believing it to be mine—all mine!

"It must be hard for you to give it up, Miss Gordon," she said again.

"It is hard; but I shall do it with a good grace," I answered. Then, thinking that she would like to see her boy, I suggested that we should go to the nursery.

"What for?" she asked, opening wide her bright blue eyes.

"To see little Guy," I replied,

"He is all right," she said curtly; "nurse will take good care of him. The little gentleman lives in clover, I assure you."

"What is the nurse's name?" I asked suddenly, without any particular reason.

For a moment I was startled by the change that overspread her countenance. She looked at me with a vague expression, as though she did not know; then recovering herself quickly, she answered—

"Mrs. Rivers."

"Has she been with you long?" I asked.

"No," she replied carelessly; "I brought no nurse with me from India, I engaged Mrs. Rivers on reaching England."

"You had good reference with her without doubt?" I said.

"She is well known to some very near and dear friends of mine," replied Lady Jesmond, "and is an excellent nurse. I can trust little Guy with her at all times"

"She struck me as being a rather queer woman," I ventured to say.

"In what way?" asked Lady Jesmond; and her voice seemed to grow scarp and harsh.

"Rather above her station, I fancied—lady like; and she speaks well," I answered.

Suddenly the roses she had been gathering fell from her hands, and I noticed that her face grew white and that a slight tremor passed over her.

"You are ill, Lady Jesmond!" I cried.

"No," she answered; "I am only cold. Though you call it summer, there is no warmth in the sun." Yet she did not look cold, but frightened and ill.

Longing to see more of Paul's little son, I went to the nursery when Lady Jesmond retired to her room It struck me at once that the nurse was not very pleased to see me.

"Good-morning, Mrs. Rivers!" I said.

She looked at me with an expression of blank surprise, and after a moment's hesitation returned my salutation. I knew from tradition that nurses are autocrats, and as I desired to see much of the child, I perceived that I must conciliate her

"May I see the little one and play with him a short time?" I asked.

She looked at me half hesitatingly and I felt sure she longed to say "No," but she smiled and answered politely—

"Certainly, if you wish it, Miss Gordon."

And then she brought the child, who was laughing and crowing with delight, to see me.

I took him in my arms and caressed him; but, when he saw that I was a stranger, the merry laughter died away, and the eyes so like his father's looked with pathetic inquiry into mine.

"Mamma," he said wistfully, "mamma!"

In a moment Mrs. Rivers was by his side.

"Bless the dear child," she said, "that is his cry the whole day long—nothing but 'mamma.'"

And again the large solemn baby-eyes looked into mine, as he cried—

"Mamma!"

"Your mamma is tired, little Guy," I said.

Mrs. Rivers looked up anxiously as she caught my words.

"Is Lady Jesmond tired? She is not very strong. People who come from India never are."

"As she was looking over the house with me," I answered, "she shivered violently, as though she was ill."

"How was that?" she asked nervously.

"I do not know—probably because she went on the lawn without hat or mantle," I answered

"Lady Jesmond is not strong," repeated the nurse. "If you would be so kind as to remain here with Sir Guy, Miss Gordon, I will go and see how her ladyship is."

Quite willingly I remained with the little fellow, kissing him to my heart's content. I tried to make him say "Felicia," and, after many futile attempts, the rosy little lips managed to murmur "Lessy," much to my delight. But what question did those baby eyes ask when they looked into my face and he cried "Mamma?"

After waiting some time, I began to feel anxious about Lady Jesmond.

"Come with me, baby Guy," I said. "We will go and see mamma."

And again in his eyes came the look of wonder and questioning that I had noticed before. I remember how I danced the boy down the long corridors, and how his merry little laugh resounded in the otherwise silent house.

Thinking Lady Jesmond might be ill, I went quietly to her door. Before I had time to rap or to speak I heard voices; and then Mrs. Rivers said—

"You must be careful, Gabrielle."

I knocked at once before I could hear more, and, when the door was opened, and they saw me, a strange confusion seemed to come over them.

"How you been waiting long, Miss Gordon?" asked Mrs. Rivers sharply.

"No; I have only just come," I replied. And then it flashed across my mind that she suspected me of listening. She would not suspect me of such meanness unless she were capable of it herself, I thought; and, as I turned to her, I caught her eyes fixed steadily on me. They were not the most friendly glances that we exchanged. "I was afraid that you were ill," I said to Lady Jesmond.

"I was tired this morning, Felicia," she answered gently; "and when I am tired I am afraid that I give way to fits of moodiness. I am better now."

I then left, taking baby Guy with me. But we did not dance down the passages this time, for my honor had been wounded by the suspicion this woman cast upon me. Why was she on such confidential terms with the mistress of Jesmond Dene? Addressing her with formal respect when they were in public, why did she call her "Gabrielle" when they were alone?

Lady Jesmond was wonderfully kind to her. She had two rooms most comfortably furnished, and she was waited upon by an under nurse who did all the work. She had every delicacy supplied to her, and her ladyship insisted that she should take wine. Indeed no servant could have led a more comfortable life than Mrs. Rivers led. She was much attached to the child, and seemed very devoted to Lady Jesmond; but there was nothing by which I could account for strange familiarity which undoubtedly existed between them.

I saw Lady Jesmond angry once, and I was the unintentional cause of it. We were talking about the boy's future, about Eton and Harrow, Oxford and Cambridge, when, quite accidentally and without attaching much meaning to the words, I said—

"You will have to decide upon one or the other when Mrs. Rivers has gone."

Lady Jesmond turned to me with flashing eyes.

"That time will never come," she said. "Mrs. Rivers will never leave me"

I was surprised that she should display so much feeling about such an insignificant matter. Then, seeing my look of wonder, she apologised.

"I am so impatient, Felicia" she said, "and I am very much attached to nurse. I should not like to lose her."

"I hope you never will," I replied. And, though we spoke of it no more, the subject did not fade from my mind.

CHAPTER XI.

A week had elapsed and no news had come from Ireland. Lady Saxon came over every day to Jesmond Dene, for she knew I was a very earnest listener to anything she had to say about Nello, and his silence had caused her considerable anxiety. She was very kind and attentive to aunt Annette, whose health did not improve; but to Lady Jesmond she seemed to have a quiet antipathy. They were most polite to each other, but rarely spoke except to exchange ordinary civilities.

"She is as you say, Felicia, a most beautiful woman; but I do not like her; and I do not know why," Lady Saxon would say to me; while Lady Jesmond would half reproach me by saying—

"I cannot understand what you see in Lady Saxon. She is excessively proud and haughty, almost repellent. I shall never like her."

Lady Saxon was very kind to the little heir, and always asked to see him when she came, never forgetting to bring him presents of toys, and she soon became a favorite of the child, and even the nurse.

Mr. Benson had gone away much relieved in mind. He was delighted that I was going to remain for some time at the Dene, that Lady Jesmond and myself were good friends, and that her ladyship had insisted on making me an allowance.

"I do not care," she said to the lawyer, "whether the money is taken from my income or my son's. Miss Gordon must have it."

We lived in peace and harmony, and as the days went on our friendship ripened and expanded,

"I call you Felicia," she said to me one morning, "you should call me Gabrielle. I prefer it."

And it was mutually agreed that for the future we should address each other by our Christian names.

"You are sure to have a love-story, Felicia," she said, after contemplating me earnestly as I stood before her; "and, unless I am a false prophet, it will not be a happy one."

"Why do you think so?" I asked her.

"I can read it," she replied, "in your face and eyes."

"You have had a love story of your own," I said.

"I," she cried, her brilliant eyes opening wide—"I! Oh, no; I have had no love-story!"

"But you married Paul for love?" I said, and her face flushed crimson.

She laughed and seemed slightly confused.

"To tell you the truth, Felicia," she said "I feel that I could love more deeply, more passionately than I loved Paul. I was young, and marriage presented an easy escape from those tiresome children. Besides I had a great desire to be Lady Jesmond. I did love Paul, but I am sure that I could love more deeply than I loved him."

"You do not mean to say that you would marry again, Gabrielle?" I cried in astonishment.

"I am certain I shall if I fall in love and the right man asks;" and she laughed. "You looked disappointed, Felicia."

"I have hitherto thought of you as belonging entirely to Paul and little Guy and Jesmond Dene," I answered.

"You thought I should be an ideal widow and live here in seclusion, devoting myself entirely to the education of my son and the cultivation of a life-long sorrow. But I do not aim at such perfection."

"Your heart is not buried in your husband's grave," I remarked.

"No; it is beating, living, full of hope, light, and longing for pleasures and gaieties. I shall stay here at Jesmond Dene quietly for a year, and then you will see what will happen, Felicia."

"You are by no means a model widow," I said.

"I am just a trifle more honest than many," she rejoined. "I was very sorry to lose Paul, and I would have done anything to save his life; but, as it was the will of Heaven that he should die, I do not see why the remainder of my life should be all darkness and gloom; do you?"

"Certainly not, if the loss of him does not make it so," I answered.

"I am ambitious," she said. "I intend to marry well, unless my ambition is spoiled by love."

We were standing on the balcony outside the library window, which commanded an excellent view of the river and the long avenue of chestnuts forming a drive. Never had I seen Lady Jesmond look fairer. The fresh morning air had tinted her cheeks with a delicate rosebloom, her blue eyes were bright as stars, and the light summer wind toyed gently with the loosened masses of bright waving hair.

"Who is that?" she asked suddenly, pointing to a tall figure striding up the avenue towards the Hall.

A spray of roses prevented me from seeing him for a moment; but, on pushing it hastily aside, I saw that it was Lord Saxon.

"Who is that?" repeated Lady Jesmond. "What a splendid man!" Her face flushed and her eyes shone with a brightness such as I had not seen in them before. "Felicia, how slow you are! Who is he?" she cried,

But my tongue clave to the roof of my mouth, and in vain I tried to give utterance to his name.

"I have seen many handsome men," she said, "but never one like him."

I shall never forget the expression of suppressed emotion on her face as she watched him.

"Do you know him? Who is he?" she repeated.

"It is Lord Saxon," I answered.

"Lord Saxon of Dunroon? You do not mean to say that is Lady Saxon's son? I was just begining to hate the very sound of his name, for she never see me to speak of any one else; but, if that is her son, I at once abjure my dislike, and will listen day long while she talks of him."

I heard the sound of footsteps, and a servant's voice announced—

"Lord Saxon."

I turned quickly, and, in doing so, I saw his first look at her. I saw how his eyes flashed, I saw the gleam of admiration that he could not control, and I knew that his beauty-loving nature was taken captive by her loveliness.

He looked at her in silence for a few moments; and then with difficulty, as I could see, he withdrew his eyes from her and looked at me.

"Miss Gordon," he said, "I am glad to see again."

But, oh, Heaven, something was missing from his voice that I might never hear again! It was not the tender voice that had whispered "Felicia" when I stood on the lawn on that memorable moonlit night.

I held out my hand to him, but my heart was too full for my lips to give utterance to words. Lord Saxon murmured something to me; I was conscious only that he desired an introduction.

Briefly I introduced Lord Saxon to Lady Jesmond.

He spoke first, and she listened as with charmed ears; and, as she responded to his greeting, his eyes seemed riveted by the fair loveliness of her face. He stood like one fascinated, unconscious of everything around him but the dazzling brilliancy of Gabrielle, Lady Jesmond.

A Queer Place to Live In.

In Formosa there is not much sickness, but when a man is ill they string him up by the neck and let him down again quickly. This generally kills or cures him, and if the former his death his celebrated by a general spree. At 21 a young man is provided with a wife, but until the age of forty he must not visit her openly. He may do so stealthily, however, and if he doesn't like her he can get a divorce in about ten minutes. A man often marries four or five times a year. No children born before the mother has reached 37 are in case permitted to live.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is made the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

A Long, Long Journey.

When the doctor came down stairs the sick-room of Mrs. Marshall the family gathered to have arranged them in the hall to waylay him.

"How soon will mamma dit well?" lisped Clyde, the baby.

"Can mamma come down stairs next week?" asked Katy, the eldest daughter and the little housekeeper.

"Did you find my wife much better?" asked Mr. Marshall eagerly. He looked pale, grave man, pale with anxiety and sleepless nights of watching.

The doctor did not smile; he did not even stop to answer their questions.

"I am in a great hurry," he said, as he took his hat; "I must go to a patient who is dangerously ill. This evening I will call again. I have left instructions with the nurse."

But the nurse's instructions were all concerning the comfort of the patient: she was professionally discreet and silent. The children playing on the stairs were told to make no noise. The gloomy day wore away and the patient slept and was not disturbed. But that night before they went to bed they were allowed to go in and kiss their mother good-night. This privilege had been denied them lately, and their little hearts responded with joy to the invitation. Mamma was better or she could not have given them. The doctor had cured her. They would love him for it all their lives!

She was very pale, but smiling, and her first words to them were:

"I am going on a journey!"

"A journey," cried the children. "Oh, do take us with you?"

"No; it is a long, long journey."

"Mamma is going to the South," said Katy, "the doctor has ordered her to. She will get well in the orange groves of Florida."

"I am going to a far distant country more beautiful than even the lovely South," said the mother, faintly, "and I will not come back."

"You are going alone, mamma?" asked Katy.

"No," said the mother, in a low, sweet voice, "I am not going alone. My Father goes with me. Kiss me good-bye, dear ones, for in the morning before you wake I shall be gone. You will all come to me when you are made ready, but each must make the journey alone."

In the morning she was gone. When the children awoke their father told them the beautiful country at which she had safely arrived while they slept.

"How did she go?" Who came for her?" they asked amid their tears.

"The chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" their father told them solemnly. People wonder at the peace and happiness expressed in the faces of these mother's children; when asked about their mother they say, 'She has gone on a journey,' and every night and morning they read in her guide book of that land where now lives, whose inhabitants shall never say I am sick, and where God himself shall wipe all tears from their eyes.

Preventing Coal Smoke.

A London housekeeper writes: The nuisance most destructive at all seasons will shortly be increased by the addition of several millions of fires daily during some months of cold weather. The chances of smoke abatement being carried out to an appreciative degree in domestic life are indeed small, until a plan is devised which will be practical, simple, and economic with existing grates. Such a plan I have actually carried out in my house. The system of putting cold coal on the top of the fire vertically under it hurries the chemical changes set up, which enables the heavy vapors rapidly ascending the chimney to carry with them unconsumed carbon—soot, which is the chief cause of the nuisance. A little time is required for complete combustion. Feeding from below the fire is not practicable, except with kitchens specially constructed, which cost money. There is, however, a medium that is feasible and advantageous to both comfort and pocket. It is as follows, and I cannot too strongly urge its adoption: With a shovel push the cinders from the end of the grate, heaping them toward its centre and leaving holes about three inches wide and as deep as possible. Into these holes drop either large or small coal; never put coke into them, nor coal on the middle of the fire; but as coke gives no smoke it may be used in making up the middle of the fire. By this mode of firing the fresh coal comes into contact laterally with hot coke, which gives facilities for its decomposition by allowing more suitable time for the chemical changes than does the vertical system.

Fuel on Russian Railways.

An official report upon the fuel used on the Russian railways has been prepared by M. Possiet, the minister of ways and communications. It appears from this report, which is concerned with the year 1881, on the forty-nine railway companies existing in the empire only four were using wood exclusively in their locomotives. The lines were short ones, running through forests abundantly supplied with wood and not far from coal supplies. The bulk of the lines used coal, and during the year the aggregate consumption of all railways was 329 cubic Russian fathoms of wood and 1,230,000 tons of coal. The quantity of English coal used was only 150 450 tons, most of which was burnt on the Baltic and the southwestern lines. The report shows a general tendency toward a larger consumption of Russian and a diminished use of foreign coal. The increase in the use of Russian coal is given at seventy thousand tons or 8 per cent. within the year. Seventy thousand tons of German coal were burnt, and they were used on lines near the German border. Since the report was up there has been a considerable increase in the supply to the railways of Donetz and Moscow coal, and the use of coke as an engine fuel has become general on the lines near the Caucasus. The Russian import duties on fuel were increased not long ago.

HOLDING UP A RAILWAY TRAIN.

The Tale of a Telegrapher on the Border.

A party of men were telling stories in St. Louis, when one of them said he had seen a good deal of service on the border, and had had a good many adventures, only one of which ever impressed him much. Down at Granada, on the Santa Fe road, when it was first opened, he had had a circus all one night with a party of robbers.

"I was in the office in the evening," he said, "getting ready to close up, when four or five hard men came in. They didn't say much at first, but seemed to be looking the ground over. We were always on the lookout for that kind of chaps, and as the machine was ticking I pretended that somebody was asking me a question. I laughed a little and seizing the key, I broke in with, 'Everybody—don't stop the express at Granada to-night, whether signaled or not. Robbers here.' They eyed me sharply, but said nothing. The sounder kept up a merry click, and I leaned back in the chair. They fooled around for half an hour and then one of them asked me what time the train was due. 'Eleven five," I said. 'Well, we want it,' one of them replied. I told him that I would signal it. About 10 30 I got out the red lantern and lighted it. Just as I got it fixed two of them jumped up with revolvers in their hands and said they would save me the trouble. While one of them covered me with a pistol the others tied me flat on my back to a settee. I couldn't move head or foot. After they got me there I began to think what sort of a scrape I had got myself in. The train would come presently and would go flying by, and then those cutthroats would murder me just for the fun of it. I had thought the thing over when I heard a sharp whistle and a roar. The men ran out to the platform with masks on and revolvers in hand. One of them had the lantern, which he swung vigorously. In going out on the platform they had left the door open, so that I could see things pretty well. I began to hope that the train would stop, for I knew that it contained men enough to do up that crowd if not taken too much by surprise. The roar came nearer and nearer, until at last I knew by the sound that they were not going to stop. With the whistle blowing at full blast and the dust flying in clouds, she swept by like a streak of lightning. It was all up with me, I thought. The robbers dropped the lantern and began to swear. Then I could hear them talking, and pretty soon I made up my mind that the train had stopped down the road away, and that they were watching it. Before long they took to their heels, mounted their horses, and were gone. When the train men came up to the depot, all armed with Winchesters, I was the only occupant. They released me and I told them what had happened. A couple of them stayed there with me and the train went on. If any express ever came any nearer being robbed without going through the mill than this one did, I'd like to know it."

Graves in the Crimea.

Cathcart Hill has now become the one British cemetery. Extending from the Alma to Balaklava there were 139 burial places, and it was found impossible to look after them all, and now Cathcart Hill is to be taken care of as a monumental record of all the British who died in the Crimea. About 70 feet has been added all round to the old inclosure, and consecrated, and a substantial wall surrounds the space, with a house through which visitors pass into the cemetery. Capt. Harford, who acts as English Consul at Sebastopol, has taken a great interest in this work, and has got the place into very good order. A number of the principal monuments from the other cemeteries have been moved and placed on Cathcart Hill. It would be impossible now to move the bodies, but the headstones if placed in this new cemetery, will be safe from damage, and will be still records of those who fell. It is a heavy work to remove these headstones, and some have to be carried a great distance; it is to be hoped that a grant of money will be made to have this done now once and for all in a proper manner. For much less important objects money has been subscribed by the public, but if the Government did this part of the work, which is their duty, a monument should be erected on the spot to all who fell, and that might be done by public subscription. During the siege Cathcart Hill was the commanding point every one went to for the purpose of seeing Sebastopol and to get a glimpse of the operations. All knew it. It is still the spot where visitors go to see the ground of the great struggle. The piece of ground has been made over to the British Government, and a substantial and fitting monument on the historical ground would be a record of the past as well as a monument due to the memory of the brave who died. The Russians have done their duty in this respect to their dead and we should not be behind them. In addition to the memorial chapel in the Russian cemetery, a very fine new memorial church has been built in the middle of Sebastopol over the graves of four Admirals who were killed, or at least died, in connection with the defense of the place. It was Admiral Lazereff who created Sebastopol; the fortress and the Black Sea fleet were produced under him. He is one of the four Admirals buried in the new church, and so proud are the Russians of the defense of Sebastopol that after the siege they erected a monument—a statue on a pedestal—to him in the midst of the ruins of the city he had founded. The statue is colossal and stands in front of the "White Buildings," overlooking the harbor. These "White Buildings," which were barracks, are still roofless and in ruins, and the figure at the Admiral, which is black, has rather a ghastly appearance with such surroundings.

Population of Hawaii.

The population of these islands to-day I believe to be about 95 900, writes a correspondent; natives 45,00 , including at least 900 at the leper settlement, and it is safe to say that at least a quarter of the natives are tainted with leprosy or an incurable malady so-called. The Chinese now number nearly 30 000; the Americans and Europeans about 15,000, one-third European; 5,000 is made up of other nationalities—Japanese, Lascars East Indiamen, Australians, Maoris, and maneaters from the South seas, whose posterity in future will be sought after to be exhibited in all civilized countries—even the African bushmen (native) will view them with amazement and as their inferior.

THE ABBE DE L'EPEE.

What Turned His Attention to the Deaf and Dumb.

Having occasion to visit a certain widow, the Abbe de l'Epee found her on his arrival absent from home, and only two young girls—her daughters—sitting in the room and sewing. The girls received the abbe respectfully, but in total silence. To all questions he addressed to them they made no answer. Upon the arrival of the mother the good priest expressed his surprise at this extraordinary behavior of her daughters. "Ah," sadly answered the woman, "it is not their fault; they were both born deaf and dumb." The abbe, filled with pity, asked if there were no means of helping them, and the mother told him that a priest, the Father Vanin (who with the Abbe Deschamps, had made some efforts on behalf of the deaf and dumb), had for some time instructed them, but since his death there was no one else to do it. This was the inducemet which caused the Abbe de l'Epee to begin his first institution for deaf mutes at Paris in 1760, where he continued to work indefatigably until his death, which took place in 1789. His memory is still, and will ever be, held in veneration, and in Paris an annual dinner is given to the deaf and dumb in that city on the anniversary of his birth. He was succeeded in his labors by the Abbe Sicard, Bebion, and others. A writer in the Penny Cyclopedia says of de l'Eppee.

"While the good abbe, with that frankness which formed a beautiful feature in his character, solicited the examination and judgment of the learned upon his method, his rivals shrouded their proceedings under a veil of mystery. The abbe devoted his life and his fortune, except a bare supply for his own wants, to the service of the class he had taken under his protection. Pereira refused to disclose his method except for a large recompense and Heinicke, in addition to receiving payment from the rich, had 4,000 crowns annually allowed him by the grand duke of Saxony. Both these persons made the art they professed an interested speculation; the Abbe de l'Epee only tolerated the rich, he was proud of being the instructor of the poor and ignorant."

A Standard Bearer.

There is a beautiful story told of an old elephant engaged in a battle on the plains of India. He was standard bearer, and carried on his huge back the royal ensign, the rallying point of the Poona host. At the beginning of the fight he lost his master. The "mahout," or driver, had just given him the word to halt, when he received the fatal wound and fell to the ground, where he lay under a heap of slain. The obedient elephant stood still while the battle closed around him and the standard he carried. He never stirred a foot, refusing to advance or retire, as the conflict became hotter and fiercer, until the mahrattas, seeing the standard still flying steadily in its place, refused to believe that they were being beaten and rallied again and again around the colors. And all this while, amid the din of battle, the patient animal stood straining its ears to catch the sound of that voice it would never hear again. At length the tide of conquest left the field deserted. The mahrattas swept on in pursuit of the flying foe, but the elephant, like a rock, stood there with the dead and dying and the ensign waving in its place. For three days and nights it remained where its master had given it the command to halt. No bribe or threat could move it. They then sent to a village one hundred miles away, and brought the mahout's little son. The noble hero seemed then to remember how the driver had sometimes given his authority to the little child, and immediately, with all the shattered trappings clinging as he went, passed slowly and quietly away.

Two Pictures.

It is a treat to see a Parisienne cross a muddy street. She advances on tip-toe to the edge of the pavement. There she poises like a bird ready for flight, and then deftly she raises her dress no more than enough to show her snowy, embroidered skirt, and without more delay she trips across, toe and heel barely touching, and mud refusing to cling to the fairy feet that hardly leave an impression on it. Landed on the other side, she gives her fine feathers a little shake into place, and passes on with shoes that look as if put on that moment. Watch an English woman immediately afterwards. She reaches the kerbstone, comes to a dead standstill, and stolidly contemplates the muddy road. Finally she selects a route. Then very cautiously she lifts her dress, making sure that the tops of her shoes are under cover, and then, slowly advancing, she puts her right foot out—plumb it sinks in the soft mud; then the left—plumb it goes the water oozing over it; and then splash! splash! until the other side is reached, when, with soiled skirts and soaked shoes, she proceeds on her wet and muddy way. Nothing could be more characteristic of their respective nationalities, and nothing could be more amusing than the mutual contempt for each other's ways.

A Fox Steals a Baby.

Considerable excitement has been caused lately at Katsse by the doings of a fox. A young, well to-do farmer and his wife, who have a child two months old, are occupying a small wooden structure during the rebuilding of their former premises. On Sept. 13 the wife as usual went to sleep with the little one, but, waking during the night, was surprised to find it had left her side. She at once called her husband, when it was discovered that one of the frame wooden doors had been broken open. The suppositions naturally followed that some one had entered and stolen the infant, consequently the father started with the intention of arousing the neighbors. He had, however, only just stepped outside when he perceived a large fox run from under the veranda of the house opposite. Suspecting that Reynard was the culprit, lights were procured and a search made, which to the delight of the parents, resulting in the discovery of the baby, who, strange to say, had received no injury beyond a few scratches.

The baseball season is over for the National League, but our babies will continue base bawling during the winter months

It is said that American babies swallow 1,500 thimbles annually. This may account for the surprising amount of brass noticed in the composition of the grown up American baby.

Books.

There is perhaps no greater wonder than a book. By the help of little figures or marks placed upon reeds, or skins, or some other available material, men have been able to transmit their thoughts through thousands of years. The names and shapes of things, the deeds and sorrows that have occurred as far back as the time of Adam, have been made known to us. Even those abstract and invisible thoughts, which have no shape or substance, but which, nevertheless inspired the writer, and have since inspired others, are all put down in little letters or figures, and made eternal. The songs of David, the sublime grievings of Job, the speculations of Plato, the visions of Homer, have by those means been handed down faithfully for many centuries.

To read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest all the thoughts and learning of others is evidently impossible. It is beyond the compass of any intellect. But we may gather a portion of this knowledge, and the object is to know how to begin this humbler task.

We must not read to waste. We must be moderate if we wish to gain much. The bee does not overload himself with the nectar of flowers, but takes what he can carry away. We must select also, and see that the quality of what we take be good.

We should read not merely that we may make money, not to sharpen our intellect, but to enlarge it. We should read in order to know and feel what is good, and what is evil, and to do what is good and useful. Are we ambitious? let us learn humility. Are we avaricious? let us learn content. When a man can truly say to himself, "My mind to me a kingdom is," a kingdom of which he is the absolute ruler.

A Policeman's View of Burglary.

A correspondent sends a contemporary an interesting account of the ideas of a policeman on the question at issue between them and the burglars. "We often have a laugh at what the papers say about the burglars and the police," said the constable, an inspector with twenty years' experience. The public forgets that the house-breaker 'knows his way about' much better than the constable. It is the burglar's profession to steal: it is ours to catch him. His tread is light: our tread is heavy. On a frosty night—and 'cracking' goes on mostly in the winter—our tread can be heard three or four hundred yards off. The burglar listens—maybe he laughs, if he's an old hand—and sets to work when he knows the coast is clear. Bless you, he doesn't want anyone to watch; he does that himself. Yes, sir, give us revolvers; give us a military drill in their use, and let us have boots with india-rubber soles. Laugh at that. Well, the burglar would not. None of your hard, heavy boots, weighing I don't know how many pounds, but light ones, with thick india rubber bottoms. Then we could walk and listen. Now we make a noise—one, two three, four, on the pavement, like the tread of an elephant—while the burglar does his work. Then the odds would be in our favor. Instead of that it is now about twenty to one in favor of the 'lag,' and a criminal with these odds does not mind risking a little.

What the Moon is Doing to the Earth.

The tides are caused mainly by the moons as it were, catching hold of the watee as the earth revolves around on its axis. This must cause friction on the earth as it revolves and friction, as every one knows, causes loss of power. Suppose a wheel with hair round its rim, like a circular brush such as is used for hair-brushing by machinery; if this brush be revolving rapidly, and we hold our hand ever so lightly on the hair, so that it is slightly rubbed backward as the wheel revolves, we can understand that the speed of the wheel will be gradually diminished, until at last it will be brought to a stand-still, provided there is no additional power communicated to the wheel or machinery or hand beyond what was given to set it spinning round. Now this is somewhat analogous to what is happening to the earth in its rotation. There is reason to suppose that the action of the tides is slowly but surely lessening the speed of the earth's rotation, and consequently increasing the length of the day, and that this action will continue until the earth revolves on its own axis in the same time that the moon takes to revolve round the earth. Then the day, instead of being twenty four hours as now, will be about twenty-eight days, and the earth will be exposed to the full blaze of the sun for about fourteen days at a time. The change this will bring about on the face of the earth can hardly be exaggerated. All life, both animal and vegetable, will be destroyed; all water will be evaporated; the solid rocks will be scorched and cracked, and the whole world reduced to a dreary and barren wilderness. It is supposed by some that the moon has already passed through all this hence its shattered and bare-looking surface. That the earth, being so much larger, has more quickly acted upon the oceans which once were under the moon's surface, and stopped almost entirely its revolution, round its own axis, thus causing it to have a day equal to twenty-eight of our days, and the heat of the sun has already to it what in future ages it will do to the earth.

Rapidity of the Blood Currents.

The rate of the blood current generally increases with the activity of the animal, being most rapid in birds. In insects, however, it is comparatively slow. But this is because the air is taken to the blood—the whole body being bathed in air, so that the blood has no need to hasten to a special organ. However, activity nearly doubles the rate of pulsation in a bee. The motion in the arteries is several times faster than in the veins, but diminishes as the distance from the heart increases. In the carotid of the horse, the blood moves twelve and one-half inches per second, in that of man sixteen; in the capillaries of man one to two inches per minute; in those of a frog one inch.

Men's Foibles.

Men with red noses are the light houses warn mariners when "half seas over."

Men with dudish habits are coated high in the tailor market.

Men with slovenly ways are balanced and found wanting.

Men with money to spend can make most any man their friend.

Stockmar's Diamond Wedding.

Golden weddings are events of rare occurrence, but diamond weddings, as they are called in Germany, which are celebrated after 60 years of married life, excite a national interest even in a country where an Emperor is able at 88 to sit for three hours in the saddle, and where a Minister in his seventieth year delights in keeping the whole diplomatic world on tenter hooks from one end of the year to the other. The German papers give an account of the diamond wedding of Gen. Steckmar, (no relation of Baron Stockmar,) which took place on the 18th of October at Dessau. Genr Stockmar is in his ninety-first year, and both he and his wife are said to be in the enjoyment of perfect health. Gen. Stockmar is one of the oldest friends of the German Emperor. They met for the first time, as mere boys, on the battle of Jena in 1806. At one of their most recent meetings when the General expressed a hope that his Majesty might bring his shares up to par, the Emperor replied in his own humorous way: "Oh! Stockmar, you are not a courtier; if you were a true courtier you would have said, 'Oh! your Majesty, at least 20 per cent above par!'"

Aristocratic Cooks.

Louis XV. gave the most exquisite suppers at Le Petit Trianon, prepared by his own hands and those of his most favored courtiers, for a thorough knowledge of gastronomy was in those days an indispensible accomplishment to the fine gentlemen. All, majesty included, would don the cook's apron, and assisted by four pages to do scullion's duties, go to work; the king would devote himself to "poulet au basilic" and preparations of eggs, in which he was highly skilled; the Duc de Gontant would prepare the salad, the Duc de Coigni would superintend the rotti—each one of the party being famous for certain dishes—and there were never fewer than forty-eight. In the salon above the tables were splendid with Sevres, and gold and silver plate, and vases filled with the rarest flowers. Attendants were dispensed with altogther; one course being finished, at the stamp of the foot the table sunk through the floor, and another, completely furnished, rose in its place.

An Eight-Year-Old Murderer.

The Ravel Gazette gives an account of a preliminary investigation in which a little girl aged only 8 years was charged with having murdered another little companion only 5 years old by stabbing her with a knife which was found to have passed downwards through the lungs and penetrated the heart. The circumstances seemed to point to premeditation. The day before the elder girl wanted to obtain a piece of gay-colored cloth which the other had in her possession but refused to give up. So the elder threatened to killher unless she surrendered it next day. This threat was made in the presence of her own sister. Next day she repeated her demand for the coveted piece of cloth, and upon being again refused she instantly stabbed the little one.

Bismarck's Tyranny.

The duchy of Schleswig, recently wrested from Denmark by Germany, is in a state of ferment over the law, originating with Bismarck, forbidding any of the people to speak the Danish language. Even school children are punished when they speak among themselves in their native tongue, and so far has this obnoxious law been carried that a girl's birthday festival was broken up and the guests arrested and fined because they sang some old Danish folk-songs.

Milked by a Snake

John Yard, a farmer living on the Brunswick pike, eight miles from New York, has been pasturing a number of cows on a lot in his place. For a number of times he noticed that one of the finest of them every morning was as dry as though she had been milked. He was puzzled at this, and as an experiment changed her to another pasture. She immediately began to give the usual amount of milk. After a few days she was returned to the pasture with the other cows, and at once began to come in dry as before. Finally Mr. Yard had a boy to watch the cow. The mystery was then quickly solved. The boy reported that early in the morning a large snake, "the biggest he had ever seen," came and breakfasted from the cow's udder, draining it completely. The cow did not seem to mind the operation. The facts are vouched for by respectable persons who have seen the snake taking its matutinal meal.—[New York Tribune.

Four M's in Jewish History.

Four of the strongest links in the chain of Jewish history are forged with the letter M, and around the name Moses are clustered some of the brightest epochs of our people. Moses the lawgiver. Moses Maimonides the Jewish Luther, Moses Mendelssohn the philosopher and Moses Montefiore the philanthropist, are names revered and dear to all Jewish hearts, The first three are known to us by the qualities of the brain: they have obtained a place in our history by the greatness of their intellect; but Moses Montefiore is endeared only to us, and he has earned his place in Jewish annals by the qualities and greatness of his heart.—Rabbi Wise.

The coat was a very bad fit—too full in the back. "That'll never do," said the customer; "It's like a shirt on a bean pole." "Dot coat, my frient," replied the dealer, "ish a very stylish garment. Look at dot back! Mein gracious, it ish lufly. See dot peautiful puffing—der latest style—and don't you forgot it. It was made on Fifth avenoo. It is der Fadder Hubbard style and ish actually worth so much as five tollar more for dot cut," and five minutes later the delighted customer left the store with his Father Hubbard coat.

A voudoo doctor in Washington, when a believer comes to him to find out what is to be the issue between him and his enemy, drops two silver coins into a skillet of boiling water, adds a pair of black chicken feathers, and in the course of a satisfactory incantation manipulates the skillet so that the coin which represents the believer shall hop up and down upon the coin which represents his enemy; and the believer pays five dollars with alacrity for so convincing an exhibition.

MARKDALE NOV. 13, 1884.

—On the 10th inst., Neil McCannel, Esq., of the township of Glenelg, Co. of Grey. Deceased once held a prominent position in the municipal management of Glenelg; while his urbane demeanour and friendly disposition, endeared him to all with whom he came in contact.

Our Improvements.

There are few villages in Ontario that have made such steady progress upwards and onward, as our own town of Markdale; neither have our improvements been of a flimsy, ephemeral nature, but, we can boast of a greater number of substantial buildings than any other town of its population, in this or any other County in the province. The number of buildings erected this season is perhaps not equal to some former years, yet some of them are of such a character as to make up for number.

The first important improvement of the season is that of Mr. J. W. Ford, of which we briefly referred to some time ago. At a cost of over $4.000, Mr Ford has introduced the roller system into his flour mill, which system is now being, almost universally adopted througout the Continent. This mill was erected but a few years since, but, the proprietor, being an enterprising business man, is determined to keep abreast with the times and has made the above change, which we hope may result profitable to himself, as well as the community.

VICTORIA MILL.

Mr. Angus Plewes has erected a new mill from the bottom, which has this week commenced operations; this is another full line roller mill with the latest improved machinery throughout Mr. Plewes is a first-class practical miller, (in fact we might say the whole Plewes family connection are millers) however Mr. Angus has spirit, enterprise and push sufficient to carry him through almost anything; at a cost of about $7,000 he has completed, what he considers "a model" mill; this in itself is a valuable addition to the place.

The Revere Hotel was this summer been overhauled and an addition built thereto. The City Hotel enlarged. Mr. Wilson Benson has completed a substantial brick block on Mill St. Mr. J. McKenna, a two-stcry building for a blacksmith shop. Mr. Rae has finished his pair of stores with public hall above. These stores have, by all odds, the finest fronts in Markdale, being large plate glass. Mrs. Caswell has also erected and finished a large boarding house overlooking the railway. This is a large square building with cottage roof, and is well finished. Then there is Joseph Gibson's residence on George St., a veneered house; a new saw-mill at Barrhead Mills, and a saw-mill in course of construction by M. Armstrong.

Were it not for the great scarcity of lumber the above list would have been greatly swelled, as it is, we have no reason to complain of the season's advancement, but rather congralute ourselves on the extent and class of additional wealth to our prosperous village.

ANNIVERSARY.

The Canadian Order of Oddfellows and Ancient Order United Workmen of this village held their annual union entertainment on Thursday evening in their hall. The hall was well filled and a very pleasant and enjoyable evening was spent. An hour passed in games and general social amusement, followed by refreshments, after which a programme was entered upon and gone through in which Mr. Wm. Brown appeared as representative of the A. O. U. W. order, and Mr. A. Turner in behalf of the C. O. O. F., each producing forcible argument in favor of the respective orders. The following also appeared:—Miss Wilson, music; Mr. Porter, recitation; Mr. W. A. Brown, song; Mr. Sparling, reading; Rev. Mr. Casson, address; and the "National Anthem" by the assembly. This wound up "ThanksgivingDay" in a very pleasant way.

FOX HUNT.

Last Monday a party of our sportsmen went out to try their luck, amongst whom was Smith, McNea, Brothers and others, whose names we did not learn. They took the railway-track north, and when a short distance across the Saugeen river, the dogs "gave tongue," and in a few minutes a rousing silver-colored fox came bounding across the track, considerably in advance of the dogs; but Reynard met an unexpected foe in an unerring slug from Smith's Winchester, which rolled him over and over. He soon regained his feet, when McNea gave him another "send-home;" yet, there was sufficient vitality left to carry him to his den, some 500 yards distant. The boys procured spades and shovels, and removed as much earth as would have made an excellent cellar for a large commercial house. Night put an end to their efforts.

THE U. S. PRESIDENTAL ELECTION.

On the 4th inst. the Yankee nation was thrown into its usual quadrennial turmoil as to whom should belong the power of displacing all, or nearly all, the public servants of the country, and supplanting old servants with the inexperienced public hands who may have rendered any service to the successful party. The candidates were Blain, Republican, and Cleveland, Democrat. The latter has been successful, if the voters in the Electoral College remain true to their party. The Republicans have been the masters of the situation since 1861, and it is said much of their ascendancy was due to the dispensing power they possessed in connection with the late war. It is to be hoped that the incoming President will inaugurate a Reciprocal commercial trade offer to our Canada, so that business men dealing to and with the respective countries will not be put to the inconveniences they have been since the Republican party came into power.

HONEST RIVALRY.

It has been with a degree of regret that we have witnessed the un-editorial action at law between our esteemed confreres, the Chronicle and the Review of Durham. Honest rivalry need not make enemies; but the two worthies mentioned have carried their opposition so far as to bring their respective households into the fray—the efforts of the two belligerents being to see which of them could first present Her Majesty with another ratepayer. The figures will be found in another column. We generally make a moderate charge for legal advice, but, in respect to the fraternity, this is gratis:—Next Monday morning, meet at Garafraxa street bridge; shake hands across the Saugeen River, go down to Middaugh's arm in arm, and drown your antipathies in his refreshing—clarified cider.

THE WHEAT SUPPLY.

Further developments in connection with the grain market do not offer much ground for hope of any considerable increase in prices. According to the October report of the Americane department of agriculture, the wheat crop exceeds that of last year by 100,000,000 bushels. The probable wheat requirements of the world—exclusive of the home demand in the wheat producing countries—is estimated at 273,815,000 bushels, and the available supply at 287,000,000 bushels, leaving a surplus of about thirteen million bushels. There has been considerable loss in harvesting the wheat crops in Russia, especially in the northern portion of the empire, owing to snowstorms, and only the southern region will be able to bring its full quota to market. But any deficiency in the European supply from this source is likely to be more than made up by the good harvest in England and other parts of Europe, In England a larger area than usual has been planted with wheat this fall, which will have a depressing effect upon the market in view of the probability of an increase in the domestic supply next year. On the whole the prospects are not favorable for any rise in the price of wheat, and the farmers will do well to market their grain at the ruling prices instead of holding for higher rates.—Toronto News.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—In your last issue of the STANDARD, Meaford Road correspondent No. 2 charges me with having taken the stump against the Scott Act. This I must positively deny. I, like many others of the electors with whom I have come in contact, have never had the privilege of seeing the Act. When I do I shall endeavor to give it my best consideration, so that if ever called upon I shall be able to vote intelligently.

Hoping you will give this space in your valuable paper,

I remain yours,

GEORGE.

Scott Act in Grey

To the Editor of the Standard.

SIR,—The majority of your readers have heard with regret that the vote cannot now be taken in Grey, so as to bring the Act in force next May. This will be felt more especially by those living on the borders of the county, as we do at Singhampton. Simcoe has voted out the Licensed Drink Traffic, and so here we will have Scott Act on one side, and Crook's Act on the other. It is anticipated this will be a sort of watering place, for dry throats of Nottawasaga. Though the petitions came short, yet we rejoice to hear that they are to be filled, and the work vigerously prosecuted. We do not believe that the majority of the people of Grey want such a traffic in their midst, or that they care to license it any longer, and thus bring themselves into partnership in the dreadful work. People of our Province are wiping their hands free from the stains, which have polluted them so long. May God hasten the day when this whole Dominion shall no longer have any complicity in the curse, which has degraded it. The drink traffic does not pay financially, socially, or morally. O! Sir, I wish my fellowmen would not degrade themselves by selling intoxicating liquors. They must see their victims going down, down in finances down in the social scale, down in morals. They must see that to gain the money they look for, they have to trust their hands through blood and tears and misery and crime. Does money satisfy consience for the work their business accomplishes? O! but he says; "See that piece of tin over the door licensed to sell, &c. The people license me, let them look after the ruin the business causes," and we turn our eyes with shame to that piece of tin, which is evidence that we authorize the work goirg on. Of course it does not relieve him, in the least from his responsibility, but it makes us partners so long as we license.

The County of Grey is under a moral obligatition to Simcoe, Dufferin, and Bruce, to go right ahead with Scott Act work. They have gone into it with the full expectation that Grey was coming into line at once, let us show them that we are true to the faith placed in us. Let every man, woman and child ask in this crisis "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Especially so let this be the case with every Christian. Does God want us to sustain the drink trade? If so let us do it. Does he want us to fold our hands in indifference? Is there any neutral ground between right and wrong? When the Lord calls us to remove the License System, and take no more blood money, let us be in our place and finish the work He gives us to do.

Write it in the nations laws,
Trampling out the License cause;
Write it each ballot white
Politicians read it right,
Where there's drink there's danger.

Singhampton, Nov., 10, '84.

Mr. Geo. Binnie of Glenelg, has just received a cheque for $20 from the Ontario Agricultural and arts As. as third prize for proficiency in Agricultural subjects. Mr. Binnie wrote out his examination papers in Mount Forest some time ago. He is also entitled to a certificate. This is the first year these prizes have been offered by the Ass'n, but there was a large number of competitors from all over the province. and it is quite an honor to this part of the country to have a man able to compete successfully against those living in the older and more favored townships. We understand that Mr. James Booming of Egremont is also entitled to a certificate.—Grey Review.

MUNICIPAL PROBS IN EUPHRASIA.

As far as we can learn there is not likely to be any opposition to Mr. Gilray for the Reeveship. For the Deputyship Mr. Wm. Fawcett will again be a candidate and will be opposed by Mr. Jas. PROJECTED CHANGE IN THE MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN FLESHERTON AND MEAFORD.

According to the present arrangement mails on this route leave Meaford on Monday mornings, calling at Griersville, Fairmount, Rocklyn, Epping, Kimberley and Eugenia, arriving at Flesherton in the evening, and returning over the same route next day; and so on during the week. It has been decided to divide the route, forming two separate services. A carrier to leave Epping at such an hour as will enable him to catch the train passing North and return after its arrival at Flesherton every day; and a carrier to leave Epping every day at 9 a. m. for Meaford and return after arrival of train from Toronto. The change is to come into effect on 1st January next. It will prove a decided benefit to the people all along the line.

IN ONE SHORT YEAR!

If the Rector of Chelston could cut out, obliterate, forget one short year of the forty-five he has lived he might be a happy man; or as happy as a mortal may be, who recognizes the responsibilities and duties of life.

His living is a rich one. He has no domestic worries or aggrieved parishioners. He is of good family—so good that he takes his place among the county people as much by right as by courtesy. In spite of his grave, not to say austere, manners, he has won the love of his parishioners and friends; and if the world he rules spiritually is a little one, his writings have carried his name far beyond it. Certainly the Rev. Percival Blake is a successful man and could that one year be forgotten might be a happy one.

The story of the year he would consign to oblivion is this:

Ten years ago, at half-past six o'clock on the 31st of December, the stars were shining brightly; at eight o'clock the congregation coming out of Chelston Church found a heavy snow-storm raging. The wind had changed. An army of dark clouds had hurried up and was attacking the earth so furiously that already everything within range was white with snow.

The Rector's mother, a lady of stately presence, came down the aisle attended by her two daughters. She paused to address a few reproachful words to the sexton, respecting the low temperature inside the church; then passed into the porch, which was full of members of the congregation preparing to fight their way home through the unexpected snow-storm. Wishing all present a happy new year, the ladies wrapped their cloaks around them, and at a brisk pace went up the lane which led to the Rectory.

There was warmth and comfort. The reflection of a roaring fire danced on every polished oak panel of the dining-room. Mrs. Blake and her daughters gathered round the blaze like priestesses round an altar; and the bell was rung to show they were ready for tea.

It was a week day. The service had been held to mark the last day of the year. The rector, a sensible man, disapproved of midnight services. His flock were better in bed at such an hour. So he had given them the ordinary evensong, and preached a short suitable sermon. His work over, he was expected home every moment.

The tea came, but not the rector. The cozy was put on the teapot, and the hot cakes placed inside the fender. The ladies sat toasting themselves and discussing who were and who were not at church.

Presently Selina, the youngest daughter, looked out of the window and reported that the lights of the church were extinguished. It was decided that Percival had gone on some errand of charity, so the ladies began tea without him. Mrs. Blake was filling the cups for the second time when the missing rector entered.

Percival Blake was above middle height, and strongly but not clumsily built. H[is] face must be described by a word which would convey more than "handsome"—it was a fine face. If now, and when in repose, it wore an expression of contented indolence, it was, nevertheless, the face of a man from whom something out of the common might be expected.

The truth is, his life had been far too uneventful and easy. He possessed abilities which had never yet been fully called forth; he was capable of passion that had never yet been aroused. The sharp spurs of ambition had not yet gored his flanks. This may be understood when one knows that at thirty he was Rector of Chelston—and even now, at thirty-five, he had not met the woman he could love.

Young as he was when the late rector, his father, died, his succession was a matter beyond question. The living of Chelston belongs to Lord Keynsham, and, as all the county knows, Percival's father was Lord Keynsham's first cousin. That the young clergyman was to stand in his father's shoes had been settled long ago. He had been brought up to do so as surely as a merchant's son is brought up to enter his business.

So the boy was apprenticed to the trade. There was no question as to his fitness for the sacred office. The fact of his being his father's son settled this. He himself accepted his position as a matter of course, and after a creditable career at Oxford, settled down to do duty as his father's curate.

He was a conscientious man, and did his work well. But his life had been made too simple, too easy for a man of his powers. It seemed all arranged: beginning, middle, and end.

His father died. He took his place, his mother and sisters living on at the rectory, and looking after the needs of the parish even as they did in his father's reign. At first they supposed Percival would marry; after a year or two they believed, perhaps hoped, he would not; now they looked upon him as cut out for a bachelor, and felt pretty sure of their tenure.

"You are late, my dear," said Mrs. Blake, as the young rector took his seat.

"Yes; and cold and hungry too."

They ministered to his creature comforts. He drank his tea and ate his muffins with gusto.

"Your sermon was very powerful," said Mrs. Blake. "At times I think you preach almost up to your poor father's level."

"Thank you," said Percival, suppressing a smile.

Preaching had not been his predecessor's forte.

"Percival," said Maria, his eldest sister, "did you notice a lady in black? She sat in the south aisle."

The laity may be confiding, but a clergyman's mother and sisters know he is able, and often ready, to take stock of his congregation.

The rector had noticed her.

"We feel sure she is the person who has just come to the Hollies."

"She is. She told me so."

"Told you so! When?"

Three pairs of astonished eyes gazed at the rector.

"It is on her account I am late. Just as I was leaving the church, old Jones told me a lady had slipped on the snow and sprained her ankle. I picked her up and carried her into the vestry."

"You carried her! Couldn't you have left that to Jones—if necessary?"

"My dear mother! She is a fine young woman, weighing about twelve stone. Jones is past seventy, and getting shaky."

This answer was unanswerable.

"Well?" asked Mrs. Blake, severely.

"Jones went to the Red Lion for a cab, or some conveyance. I tried a little amateur surgery."

"Alone with her in the vestry?"

"Her maid was there. A poor helpless creature, more hindrance than use."

Helpless or not, Mrs. Blake was relieved at hearing about the maid. "Was it a real sprain?" she asked suspiciously.

"The ankle was swollen to an enormous size. I was obliged to cut her boot off."

"Oh!" gasped Mrs. Blake. "And then?"

"I ascertained that no bones were broken, bathed it with cold water, and bound it up, in a most workmanlike way. Then Jones and the cab came. I saw my patient home, and here I am."

The Rector of Chelston bathing and binding up a young woman's ankle in the vestry was more than Mrs. Blake could stand. She rose from her seat and gave her son her ideas on the subject.

"All I can say is that carrying beautiful young women into vestries, attending to their ailments, and taking them home, is, in my opinion, an unclerical, if not a disreputable, proceeding."

The rector's cheek flushed, but he checked the hot retort which rose to his lips; still his voice and manner showed there was a limit to maternal authority and his own patience.

"I did not say she was beautiful. I would have done the same for the oldest and ugliest of my congregation. Good-night. I am going to my study."

The ladies looked blank; the more so when the hours passed without his reappearing. It was their custom at the Rectory to watch the old year out, and exchange good wishes as the clock struck twelve. Mrs. Blake grew very fidgety as midnight drew near, and was trying to bring herself to go to her son and ask his pardon. But Percival spared her this by returning of his own accord.

"Mother," he said, "you spoke hastily. But it is the last night of the year; let us forget it."

Mrs. Blake melted.

"Oh, Percival, it was only from anxiety on your account."

He laughed.

"I am old enough to look after myself."

"Yes, my dear. But, Percival, who is she?"

"I told you. Mrs. Russell, the lady just come to the Hollies."

"But who is she? No one knows anything about her. She may be an adventuress."

"Adventuresses are not likely to come to Chelston. Besides, we heard she bought the house, and I suppose has paid for it."

"Is she a lady?" asked Selina—"lady" bore a very high meaning with the Blakes.

"Undoubtedly. You can call and judge for yourselves."

Mrs. Blake made no objection to calling. Unless there was something known against her, the new arrival was entitled to a call from the Rectory folks. Besides, Mrs. Blake, still much troubled by the vestry episode, wanted to see Mrs. Russell and form her own opinions.

Twelve o'clock struck, and after the usual good wishes the family party separated.

"What will the new year bring?" said the rector, as he undressed himself. "Not much change so far as Chelston is concerned. That was a very beautiful woman," he added.

The next morning, in spite of the four inches of snow, Percival Blake felt bound to walk to the Hollies and inquire after his new parishioner. The Hollies, a medium-sized house, stood in about half an acre of garden on the outskirts of Chelston village. At the back were meadows, and through the meadows ran the deep Chelston brook or river, as the inhabitants were pleased to call it. The Rectory was half a mile from the Hollies, and Percival, as he walked the distance, had time to wonder why a beautiful young woman like Mrs. Russell should choose Chelston as an abode. Not that society was wanting, provided one was duly accredited. But the country people are rigidly exclusive, and few enter the circle on their own merits. The impression Mrs. Russell had given the rector was that of a woman who would scarcely be contented with the society of the doctor's and lawyer's wives and daughters, much less with that of the respectable farmers' women-kind.

Mrs. Russell was better. She was up, and would be glad to see Mr. Blake. The rector hesitated—thinking of his snow-caked boots—but after some vigorous work with scraper and door-mat, decided that he might venture into a drawing-room, so he followed the servant to Mrs. Russell and his fate.

His first thought was that, high as he had ranked her beauty, he had under-estimated it. But then he had seen her in the dimly-lighted vestry, and while she was suffering great pain. Now!

An artist should have painted her! A sculptor should have fixed that attitude immovably in marble! She lay on a couch wheeled round by the fire. Her pose was full of that grace which appeals so eloquently to the eye capable of appreciating beauty and symmetry of form. It was unstudied and natural, yet full of dignity. Moreover, the classical purity of her style was bound to tell upon a man of Percival Blake's good taste. Adventitious aids she had none. The thick dark shining hair was coiled simply on the well-proportioned head. Her dress was plain black, but fitting her so as to show every line of that splendid figure. The dark eyes, lashes and eyebrows looked darker, the bright red lips redder, from the contrast of the white face. White, but, if such words can convey the idea, warm-white. If color was wanting on the cheek, no one would call her pale; her complexion spoke of warmth, life and health.

And Percival marveled again that such a creature should bury herself in such a place as Chelston.

[S]he greeted him smilingly. She gave him her hand; it was white and well-shapen, but not diminutive. A tiny hand would have been a deformity with a woman of her splendid build. She thanked him for his last night's kindness. He hoped she was better, and complimented her on her fortitude. After this light skirmish of pretty sayings they settled down to general conversation.

Certainly a most interesting woman! She was animated; she was natural; she questioned the rector about the parish, the church, the schools, the neighborhood, and other subjects which are clerical specialties. Then their conversation became more eclectic—literature, music, painting, even politics. After a little while the rector found himself discussing and arguing, as if her opinion carried weight. As the Rev. Percival had a low opinion of the intellectual powers of women in general, this was a great compliment to Mrs. Russell.

The minutes passed pleasantly. At last the rector felt that, so far as time was concerned, the obligations of duty and politeness had been discharged. He showed signs of leave-taking.

"Spare me a few minutes more," said Mrs Russell. "I have something to say."

He reseated himself willingly enough.

"I suppose you are all puzzling your heads about me," she said gravely; "your mother and sisters, for instance?"

This direct attack confused the rector.

"Chelston is a little place," he said.

"And, like all little places," she continued, "much exercised about a new comer?"

"As you use the phrase, I may as well say it is the right one."

"Well, Mr. Blake, I have no wish to be an object of curiosity or suspicion. In a village, the Rectory—not perhaps, the rector—is often the headquarters of gossip."

Percival laughed; but remembering his mother and sisters, dared not deny the charge. Mrs. Russell looked at him with her great dark eyes, and smiled as she saw how correctly she had judged.

"I am right, then? Well, Mr. Blake, if you are expected to give information, it is just as well you should be correctly informed yourself."

"But I have no wish to know. It is not my business."

She shrugged her shoulders, and just raised her eyebrows. The actions were, perhaps, bordering on coquetry. Mr. Blake at once caught their meaning. His disclaimer of curiosity was not flattering to the fair woman beside him. He hastened to atone.

"I mean, if I can be of service; please command me."

He wondered at the eagerness of his own manner. She smiled.

"I should like this to be known," she said. "I have no wish for society, and I bring no credentials. My story is this: My father was a well-to-do merchant in Liverpool. His name was Bennett. My mother died when I was an infant. I was an only child, and was utterly spoiled. My father's kindness I repaid by marrying a man whom he particularly disliked. My husband died three years ago; my father shortly afterward. He forgave me on his death-bed, and left me all he had to leave. He might well forgive me. I had long before repented of my obstinacy and folly."

A hard look came into her eyes as she spoke.

"You were unhappy?" said the rector, sympathizingly.

"More than unhappy—poor, unhappy, and—ill treated. But that concerns no one save myself."

She was silent. Her eyes looked far away. Her lips hardened and grew thin with a bitter smile. Percival Blake, watching her, knew she had a past she would fain forget.

"Thank you for your confidences," he said. "You are right, living in a small inquisitive world, to publish your antecedents. I shall tell the busy-bodies as much as seems good to me. And you really mean to live at Chelston?" he continued.

"I think so. I hated the loneliness of London. I have no friends, no relations. The fit seized me to try the country. I saw this house advertised. Chelston was the same to me as another place. So here I am, with a faithful old servant to look after me."

"You will find it terribly dull."

"One may be dull, yet fairly happy. I can amuse myself. I am fond of reading, of painting, of music. Perhaps, when you know me better, you will find me something to do."

"Anyway, we must try and keep you now," said the rector, gallantly.

Then he took his leave, and went to perform less agreeable if less dangerous duties. He dared not confess to himself how greatly his interest had been awakened by the strange, uncommon beauty of this woman. But he dimly understood how it might be possible for a man to forsake friends, duty—even creed—for the sake of some one whom he pictured as not unlike his new parishioner. He was nearer to his fate than he imagined.

His account of his morning's exploits spread consternation through the rectory. With discreditable want of tact he praised Mrs Russell to the skies. His mother and sisters at once took the alarm. Percival, after all, might not be cut out for a bachelor. The joint regency was threatened—not by one who would be a suitable spouse for the Rector of Chelston, but by a terribly beautiful young widow about whom no one knew anything!

Nevertheless, they called at the Hollies, and Mrs. Blake's heart sunk as she saw that Percival had not been led astray by the glamour of good looks when he declared that Mrs. Russell was a lady. Maria and Selina, the rector's sisters, two plain, middle-aged women, who had outlived envy of another's personal charms, rather inclined to the new-comer; but their mother was obdurate. She shook her head ominously.

"There is a mystery," she said. "There is something wrong with that woman; I have a presentiment."

Mrs. Blake's presentiments were not things to be trifled with.

However, a kind of reserved friendship sprung up between the ladies. Mrs. Blake looked upon it as an armed truce, under cover of which she could better protect her son from the allurements of this mysterious siren.

But unhappily that son began to manifest a strength of will and determination to walk his own way, and, moreover, walked that way so far and so openly that the folks about Chelston began to talk; but even that troubled the rector very little.

He had long left off deceiving himself. His fate had met him. He loved this woman with all the strength of his really strong nature, and was striving, in deadly earnest, to make her love him. His passion had swept away all domestic barriers. Mother, sisters, everything faded into insignificance beside it. Life without that one woman's life was worthless. The touch of her hand, the look of her dark eyes, the sound of her musical voice, thrilled him. The Rector of Chelston loved at last—loved as only one man out of a thousand can love. His was not the sparkling transient emotion of a boy—not the dotage of the septuagenarian—it was the ardent glowing passion of a man—the love of a lifetime!

He blamed himself bitterly for this complete surrender to one dominant passion. He saw what dangers he might be led into, yet was helpless against his fate. His unhealthy state of mind was clearly shown him whilst he was engaged in the performance of a peculiarly painful duty. A son of one of his parishioners had murdered his sweetheart. He was now lying in the county jail under sentence of death. It was reported that he was callous and impenitent. His father, with tears in his eyes, begged Percival Blake to visit his boy and try and save his guilty soul. The criminal had once been the brightest of the village boys, and a great favorite of Percival's. Perhaps his pleading might succeed where another's failed. The rector at once visited the jail, and tried all his powers of persuasion to bring the convict to a proper frame of mind. But his labor was vain. The young man was quiet and respectful. He regretted the necessity for the deed, but not the deed itself.

"I loved her," he said sullenly. "No other man should have her. I would do it again rather."

Percival prayed and reasoned without moving him an atom. But the murderer at last turned to him and said:

"You've never loved a girl like I did, Mr. Blake, or you'd have done just the same."

Percival Blake turned pale. The thought struck him like a bullet—the man was speaking the truth. He—even he, the Rector of Chelston—would kill his love rather than another man should have her!

"God help me!" he groaned. "I must end this."

So one bright afternoon in April he walked over to the Hollies and told Philippa Russell he loved her. He spoke fiercely and sternly, almost like one under compulsion. In fact, he all but commanded her to return his love, and perhaps she liked him none the less for his masterful bearing.

She looked particularly lovely that afternoon. Although living in solitude, she was always well dressed. Had she anticipated the visit and wished to hasten the avowal, she could not have attired herself more effectively. The man must be ultra fastidious who could find a single fault in her personal appearance—or so thought the rector as he waited her answer.

For a while she was silent. She stood with her white fingers interlaced. Her downcast eyes gave her wooer no sign, but a wave of color crossed the healthy pallor of her cheek. Then she raised her eyes and her look set every pulse in his body throbbing. In another moment he would have thrown his arms around her.

But she checked him, although she still gazed at him. She spoke; her words were strange, but there was something in her voice which as yet he had never detected there.

"Tell me how much you love me!" she said.

"I cannot," he whispered. In truth, he dared not even tell himself.

"Tell me how much you love me!" she reiterated.

"Far above any being in the world."

A scornful smile made her look even more beautiful.

"Spare me the ordinary lover's protestations. But stay," she continued, with a marvelous change of voice and manner. "I am treating you unfairly. Percival, listen. I love you! I love you!"

She leaned a little way toward him. The action was unmistakable. His arms were round her; his lips on her lips. From that moment life held but one thing for the Rector of Chelston.

"Tell me; tell me now, Percival," whispered Philippa, as she lay passive in his arms.

Even then there flashed across him that scene in the jail. If he spoke the truth he need seek no further for a fitting simile. He bent his head, and whispered in a strange hoarse voice:

"I love you even as that young man just hanged loved. I would kill you rather than you should love another."

She laughed deliriously.

"Sweet, sweet love!" she cried. "I believe you! I love you!"

Then she laid her head on his shoulder and sobbed.

He adored her, yet he feared her. He was her master, yet her slave. She had wrung words from him which no man, certainly no clergyman, should dare to say; but she had told him and shown him she loved him. He led her to a seat, and, now that the victory was his, began to count the spoils.

"We will be married soon, dearest," he said.

She pressed her hands to her forehead.

"I did not promise to marry you," she said.

The rector wondered if he heard aright.

"Philippa, what do you mean?" he cried.

"You asked me if I loved you. I answered truly. For the rest, you took me by surprise. Come to morrow or the next day."

"But why. What is your meaning? You love me, and of course you will marry me."

She clasped her hands, then once more pressed them to her brows.

"I am telling lies," she said. "It was no surprise to me. For weeks I have pictured this moment. Percival, there shall be no deceit between us."

"None on my part," he answered gravely.

"And none on mine. I said, 'Come to-morrow.' One day of pleasant dreaming—one day of your love—seemed worth having. To-day and to-morrow are the same. Sweet love, I love you! Hold my hand—listen—and leave me."

He obeyed with a white face. She spoke for some minutes in a low voice. The gravity of her communication was shown by the change which the rector's face and bearing underwent. Save by one or two smothered exclamations, he did not interrupt her, and when she had finished speaking, sat silent and motionless. She drew her hand from his and rose. His eyes followed her, and at last, with dry lips, he whispered:

"This is the truth?"

"This is the truth," she said, moving toward the door. "Farewell. I leave here to-morrow."

At the door she lingered and looked back. Their eyes met. A shiver ran through the man's strong frame. Then, like one who makes, for good or ill, a sudden resolution he sprung to his feet.

"What do I care?" he cried. "I love you. I cannot live without you. Let it be all forgotten, or borne together."

Once more he embraced her. She made no resistance, no attempt to conceal the joy his decision gave her. But presently drawing a little away from him, she said:

"Percival, if you give me your love in spite of all, it must be forever. Nothing must part us."

"It is for ever. Nothing shall part us."

An hour afterwards the rector walked home, and informed his mother that Philippa Russell had consented to be his wife.

QUAINT AND CURIOUS.

WHY NEGROES ARE BLACK.

Surgeon Maj. N. Alcock has contributed to Nature an interesting communication as to why the tropical man is black, in which he suggests that as the lowest animal pigment-cells placed behind a transparent nerve termination exalt its vibration to the highest pitch, the reverse takes place when, as in the negro, the pigment-cells are placed in front of the nerve terminations, and that the black pigment in the skin serves to lessen the intensity of the nerve vibrations that would be caused in a naked body by exposure to a tropical sun; that, in fact, the pigment plays the same part as a piece of smoked glass held between the sun and the eye.

THREE MILES ABOVE THE SEA.

A recent traveller in Asia, Mr. Webber, states that in the mountains of Thibet he has lived for months at the height of more than 15,000 feet above the ocean with the following results: His pulse, normally sixty-three beats per minute, seldom fell below 100 beats per minute during the time he lived at that altitude. His respirations were often twice as numerous as under ordinary circumstances: a run of 100 yards would quicken both pulse and respirations more than a run of 1,000 yards would at the sea-level.

NEWSPAPER LITERATURE.

Although there are few tongues that are not represented in newspaper literature, an enormous majority are published in four languages. As a matter of course, English heads the list, inasmuch as English-speaking races have peopled North America and Australasia. The German races rank second, the French third, the Spanish fourth. The proportion is as follows: English 16,500 publications; German, 7,350; French, 3,850; Spanish, 1,600.

A WONDERFUL MACHINE.

An inventor writing to the "Scientific American" proposes to revolutionize the present system of cultivating the earth. He describes a machine that is rigged with a large windmill sails, has a tiller for steering, will travel up hill or down, and with the wind in any direction. A full-sized one of sixty-horse power may be depended upon to draw ten ploughs four miles an hour, with but one man in attendance. It will also harrow, and furnish the power to sow, reap, and mow, thrash, grind, or carry loads to market or irrigate lands. Will travel ten miles an hour in any direction and carry twenty passengers, provided there is a good breeze. The machines are not expensive to build.

The Hyprocrisy of the Face.

An Italian author, Signor M. P. Mantegazza, professor of natural history at the Museum of Florence, has just contributed a very remarkable volume to the list of scientific works. Mantegazza's work is devoted to the subject of human physiognomy and the expression of the emotions; it deals very amply with one very interesting question—whether it is possible to mask one's feelings by force of will so completely as to deceive the keenest and most experienced observer. Civilized, and even uncivilized peoples, have been steadily training themselves to master all outward signs of emotions as far back as history records—the fashionable man of Paris, London or St. Petersburg tries to appear as impassive as a god; the American, less hypocritical, aims nevertheless to cultivate something of Indian gravity and stoicism. What are the results of the long continued effort of man to master feeling and to hide what Nature seeks to express under all circumstances? They are sometimes very wonderful; but M. Mantegazza does not believe they are ever wholly successful—notwithstanding that the capacity for self-conquest may have increased steadily through generations. Woman succeeds, indeed, better than man; and the uninitiated may be deceived by either, but the experienced physiologist can never be wholly duped by the immobility of a face or the tearlessness of an eye.

How to Increase the Pleasure of Eating.

In his essay on "The Pleasure of Eating," Count Rumford says: "The pleasure enjoyed in eating depends—first, on the agreeableness of the taste of the food; and, secondly, upon its power to effect the palate. Now, there are many substances extremely cheap, by which very agreeable tastes may be given to food, particularly when the basis or nutritive substance of the food is tasteless, and the effect of any kind of palatable solid food (of meat, for instance), upon the organs of taste, may be increased almost indefinitely by reducing the size of the particles of such food, and causing it to act upon the palate by a larger surface. And if means be used to prevent its being swallowed too soon, which may easily be done by mixing it with some hard and tasteless substance such as crumbs of bread rendered hard by toasting, or anything else of that kind, by which a long mastication is rendered necessary, the enjoyment of eating may be greatly increased and prolonged." He adds that "the idea of occupying a person a great while, and affording him much pleasure at the same time, in eating a small quantity of food, may perhaps appear ridiculous to some, but those who consider the matter attentively will perceive that it is very important."

The secret of the jumping Mexican bean is out. It was discovered on the Comstock lode in Nevada. Each bean contains a worm which can uncoil itself with such sudden vehemence that the bean is made to jump. The Nevada newspaper which avers this also says that the worm is a provision of nature whereby the beans are distributed and become planted. Dropping from the trees which produce them, they jump about until they fall into crevices in the ground, where they are imprisoned and may take root.

ROMANCE OF A BRACELET.

Found After Two Thousand Years on the Banks of the Oxus—Interesting Historical Reminiscences Suggested by the Event.

A beautiful gold bracelet found upon the banks of the Oxus, and purchased for £1,000 by the South Kensington museum, carries imagination back to some of the most stirring events of antiquity. The very spot where it was discovered calls up to the mind a bewildering series of old-world episodes, the tragic histories of Xerxes and Darius, and the terrific prowess of conquering Alexander. It would be easy to go still further back, for the waters of the Oxus flow through the cradleland of Aryan civilization, and on either banks lie the deserts, once fertile provinces, in which the ancestors of European nations lived, fought and died. This bracelet, however, antique though it is—more than 2,000 years old—does not encl asp so wide an area of history. Yet it is surely enough for any single jewel that it should summon up to the recoll ection of the nineteenth century the prodigious events of Persian and Macedonian empires, and recall, as if by actual presence, the odalisques for whom the great Mede planted his pavilions of purple and gold under the plane trees by the broad Asiatic stream, the ladies who graced the banquets of the mightiest of Babylonian monarchs as he lay encamped upon the Bactrian frontier, who shared with both Mede and Persian the terror of fight before a furious conqueror, whose by Alexander's side when he feasted with his captains after victory, and who, in the surpassing splendor of their pride, asked as the simplest of an evening to see the stately city of Persepolis destroyed by fire. Here, in the very place where this jewel has lain hidden all these years, stood, perhaps, the sumptuous tents in which the lovely Thais held her court in the midst of the greatest army the world has ever seen; and—who knows? perhaps this very bracelet was her own, and once clasped the wondrous white arm that had a power, which all the hosts of embattled Asia could not compass, to stay the march of "the great Eurathian," and dictate to the conqueror of the world the movement of his troops. Perhaps he displayed it on himself, and it may be that, as she pointed to the treasury city of Cambyses, doomed to blaze for her amusement, this circlet of enameled gold glittered in the light of the torch which, the legends tell us, Alexander fastened with his own hand to set, at her bidding, to the beautiful palace of the Forty Pillars. Fancy can not run over such a theme, for its possibilities are infinite; yet the fact remains that it has been found, and found, too, upon such historic ground as justifies much license of imagination, and conjures up all the romance of the old Oxus stream.

Once upon a time there stood upon the seacoast of Ionia a temple of Apollo, rich in treasures of gold and jewels. The Persians invaded Greece, and the ministers of the god impiously betrayed their trust and surrendered the costly spoils of the oracle to the enemy. When the foreign hordes returned, befouled, homewards, the priests, afraid of the vengeance of their country, begged to be taken away and settled in some distant spot beyond the reach of angry Greece. So they left Ionia and traveled eastward until they came to the Oxus, and there, in that pleasant land, they planted themselves as a colony, still retaining their name of Branchidæ and the hereditary duties of the temple of Apollo that stood at Miletus. Yet they were not so far off but that the arms of Alexander could reach them, and, as he advanced toward India, rolling back the armies of Asia before him, scattering them as the sun scatters the mists right and left, the conqueror came to the arms and to this colony of these treacherous priests. The vengeance of Greece was rapid, cruel, and complete, and the Branchidæ ceased to exist. Here for a while Alexander encamped, and on that occasion, if fancy may dare to imagine it, some fair one of his court, perhaps the incomparable Athenian herself, lost her bracelet. It slipped off that arm—the despair of sculptors, the boast of Greece, the living scepitre which swayed the greatest soldier our earth has known. It fell down among the piled carpets and luxurious cushions with which Hephæstion Macedonian, following the customs of the country he had conquered, had furnished the sumptuous pavilions of his lords. No matter; it would be found by the slaves next day. Nevertheless it was forgotten, and when the camp was struck the ornament, perhaps, got trampled into the ground, and the vast host of the conqueror passed over it, leaving it where it had fallen, to be discovered after a lapse of more than two thousand years. What had he, this imperious beauty, who held in thrall the man for whom the limits of our earth were too small; who commanded with a smile the destruction of royal cities, and flung away with a jest the destinies of nations—what had she to care about in such trifle as a bracelet of enameled gold? Even Alexander gave it her, would he not place it with another? Susa, "the city of lilies," was within a day's camel ride, and were there not jewels enough in the pleasure palace of the Persian kings to smother all the beauties of Corinth under their weight? So she lightly forgot it. The multitude of the Macedonian army, the nation of camp-followers, the myriads of beasts of burden, stamped and trudged over the spot where the tents of Thais had stood, and, fortunately for us, not one of all that mighty host saw that jewel where it lay. And so it has happened that after twenty centuries the gem lies in South Kensington. As a specimen of ancient goldsmiths' work it is of great value; for though antiquity was prodigal in personal ornament, we have but little left to assure us of the wondrous taste, surpassing skill of the artist goldsmiths of Asia, Greece, or Rome. That they were magnificent in their works all history assures us; but the surviving jewels are all too few to give any adequate idea of the taste and richness of their handicraft in heaping the ornament armlet is a plain "bangle," having at the ends two winged sphinxlike figures, with eagles beaks and twisted horns, showing, probably, to Assyrian influence, as the eagle is not a Greek ornament, though common in Nineveh art. Originally it was gold lined, but the lustrous materials had all perished, leaving only sufficient discoloration to prove that it was once there. That the bracelet was Asiatic and not European in design is probable, and there is reason, indeed, for supposing that it was part of the spoil taken by Alexander as he swept onward, emptying the treasuries of imperial capitals, and plundering palaces and cities. Who made this priceless bauble that has come to England after all these years? Fancy finds the question an easy to answer as the other, who wore it? Nor, remarking how many fashions and patterns in ancient jewelry go back to the banks of the Ganges, and how in the old days of magnificence in jewellery, famous goldsmiths, masters of their craft, traveled like princes from court to court, and were passed on by the personal invitation of kings from palace to palace, is it beyond the possibilities of fact that this armlet was the work of some Aryan artificer? In primitive countries the goldsmith work in the open air; the customer comes and sits to watch his jewels being made. There is not light enough within the shop so the smith squats upon his carpet spread on the raised platform before the door, and there, in the bright sunshine, with his tastefully-formed implements about him, melts the metal and molds it, engraves and begems it, all in full sight of the busy street. Loiterers stop and watch. They tell each other it is for so-and-so. The goldsmith there has no secrets. His weights are public property as it were; his work proceeds under the eye of all his neighbors. To the western mind the simplicity of his processes, the apparently rude apparatus with which they work, raises a smile; but when the jewel is complete all the world confesses its beauty, and scornful Europe does not hesitate to adopt the pattern. So that the pattern of Thais's armlet, dropped on the banks of the Oxus, survives, through the "armillas" of Rome in the bangle of to-day; and the plain gold band with fantastic little creatures of mythic form and ornaments at the ends, just such as Alexander's favorite wore, may be seen any day in the jewellers' shop of our own metropolis.

This armillia or psallion was especially a favorite ornament with the nations of Mesopotamia, where men wore it as well as women. The Greeks considered it effeminate for men to do so and the Romans imitated them, though the dandies of both nations might be seen with bracelets on the arm. As a military reward the armlet was highly valued, and a massive coil of gold twisted six times around the soldiers arm was as honourable as the Victoria cross. The jewel, to which we are referring, however, is too dainty in its design for any but a lady's arm, and though, of course, it may be all that is left of some handsome young Persian who carried his lady-love's favor into fatal flight it is far more legitimate to suppose that it belongs to the sex whom such ornaments best adorn. Who she was the world can never know; but the place of its finding, and the date that is assigned to it, carry us back to the days of Darius and Alexander. Each of these great captains, as was the custom of the times, took with them on their campaigns the favorite ladies of their court, and with such circumstances of luxury that they were able at a moment's notice to produce in any spot, whether desert or wilderness, the refinements and pleasures of their palaces; so that both in the Persian and Macedonian camps there were jewels enough, and to one or the other belongs probably the armlet that has just been discovered. It may be that some fair Persian almond eyes kindled out of their voluptuous dreaminess into momentary anger when the slave came to tell the petted oualisque that the bracelet could not be found. Or it may be that some quickly angered Athenian was the sufferer by the loss, and—alas for the manners of Greece!—that some poor Cytemnestra of a maid went away weeping from the tent conscious of boxed ears. Yet, whatever it may have been, we have got the armlet, and imagination can do with it nearly as it pleases.

Women Bull Fighters Routed by a Bull.

A bull fight of a novel kind took place at Tarragona recently, the performers being women clothed in the male toreara suit. The bulls were all young and full of fire. The first one let into the arena made straight for one of the toreras, and sent her spinning in the sand several yards off. A second torera rushed to the rescue with her capa, which she waved before the bull to draw off its attention from her discomfited colleague. The bull accepted the challenge at once, and with a rapid twist of the neck caught the banderilla and sent her flying. She fell on her face, and followed the previous toreara in her retirement, bleeding from several scratches. The third torera then advanced; but no sooner had the bull caught sight of her than he bounded toward her and tossed her. After this the bull took a quiet walk around the arena, waiting for fresh sport. No further competitor entering the list, the crowd began to show signs of impatience, which grew at every moment, until they finally began breaking up the seats and throwing brickbats into the arena, yelling anathemas at the cowardice of the toreara company. The stewards then announced that the money would be returned. This was done partially; but the cashier's office suddenly closed, that official having bolted with the rest of the takings.

A scene of indescribable uproar occurred when the fact became known, and the work of demolition was pursued with increased fury. The gendarmes were called in to restore order, but only succeeded in adding to the general confusion, in which they were roughly handled. The arrival of three companies of infantry enabled the managers to clear the amphitheatre. The most extraordinary part of the affair is that, undeterred by the fate of the first company of toreras and their manager, who were marched off to prison besides, the workwomen of the tobacco factories of Madrid are preparing to give an exhibition of their prowess, and a troupe is organizing to do the round of the arenas in all the principal towns of Spain.

Lord Dufferin's Secretary.

Lord Dufferin is to be congratulated as well on his courage as on his perspicacity in having appointed Mr. Mackenzie Wallace to the responsible and important position of his private secretary. It should be understood that the office is of much greater significance than its name would seem to imply. The private secretary of an Indian Viceroy is his chief's alter ego in great as well as in small matters; he is the power behind the throne. If he is a strong man and a wise man, he has immense influence for good; if feeble and foolish, he can do an immensity of harm. Few people out of India know to what degree the success of Lord Mayo's regime was due to Owen Burne. Evelyn Baring, as Lord Northbrooke's private secretary, was the Moltke of the famine campaign in Tirhoot. Poor Colley's skilful scheme of campaign for the Afghan war was of much benefit to the Viceroy whom he served so loyally.

Brother and Sister Blind.

Dr. R. B. Bloss, of Troy, during a recent hunting trip in the north woods, found at Port Hudson, Essex county, two unfortunate persons who aroused his deepest sympathy. One was a girl 18 years old, who had been totally blind from birth. Her brother, aged 19 years, was also blind, his sight having been ruined by cedar juice flying into his eyes while he was chopping in the woods. The sightless pair, unable to provide for themselves, were living in extreme destitution. Dr. Bloss determined if possible, to mitigate the sorrow of their condition. He has brought the boy to Troy and Dr. Mitchell, the oculist, thinks that the sight of one eye may be partially restored. For the other eye there is no hope. Some kind-hearted citizens have already given liberally for the aid of the boy who was entirely without money. Dr. Bloss expects to secure for the girl admission to the Batavia Institute for the Blind. Her touch is wonderfully delicate and she can thread a needle, sew, and distinguish slight differences of fabric through the sensitiveness of her finger tips.

You Cant Make $500 by Reading This, even if you have chronic nasal catarrh in its worst stages, for although this amount of reward has for many years been offered by the proprietors of Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, for any case of catarrh they cannot cure, yet notwithstanding that thousands use the Remedy they are seldom called upon to pay the reward, and when they have been so called upon they have universally found that the failure to cure was wholly due to some overlooked complication, usually easily removed by a slight modification of the treatment. Therefore, if this should meet the eye of anybody who has made faithful trial of this great and world-famed Remedy without receiving a perfect and permanent cure therefrom, that person will do well to either call upon or write to the proprietors, the World's Dispensary Medical Association, of Buffalo, N.Y., giving all the particulars and symptoms in the case. This finishes the largest and most elegant list of rewards ever offered by any publisher in the world. It will positively be the last unless the results of this competition far exceeds the preceeding ones, as I certainly cannot afford to continue them. I have now kept faith with my subscribers and the public in continuing these Bible competitions for a year, as promised, and this great one, offering this immense list of rewards will be a fitting close to the affair. Bear in mind every one competing must send one dollar with their answer for which TRUTH, (the cheapest and best weekly for the money) will be sent six months. You therefore pay nothing extra for the privelege of competing for these costly rewards, as one dollar is the regular subscription price of TRUTH for a half year. You cannot fail to be well pleased with your dollar investment even if you do not succeed in gaining any one of these rewards, as TRUTH is extra good value for the money as thousands of our subscribers have testified. Long lists of winners in previous competitions appear in nearly every issue of TRUTH, and full lists of winners in this entire competition will be published in the issues of TRUTH immediately after the close of the competition on fifteenth February, with the full name, street and number, when in cities, and in fact all the addresses as completely as possible, in order that all may be satisfied that there is no fraud or humbug in this matter. In order to prevent fraud, the proprietor of TRUTH reserves the right to deny any person or persons the privilege of competing for these remarks. We have always done exactly as promised during this year in conducting these competitions, and our reputation for fair and honorable dealings, is too well established now to risk overthrowing it. Look up these Bible questions, it will do you good apart from anything else. These competitions have done, we are assured, a great deal to promote the study of the Bible among all classes. Now this may be your last opportunity to secure an elegant piano, a gold watch, a fine horse and carriage, in addition to a half year's subscription to one of the most widely circulated and most popular weekly magazines you may have, so attend to it now. Don't delay. All money must be sent through the post office or by express. None can be received by telephone or telegraph. Don't forget that we don't guarantee that everyone will get a prize, but out of nearly twenty-four hundred rewards you doubtless will secure something. Be prompt. Answer as soon as possible after seeing this notice, and TRUTH will at once be forwarded as an acknowledgment of your subscription, and your letter will take its place in the order it is received at this office. There is no favouritism, and all are treated alike, fairly and squarely.

A WISE CONCLUSION.

If you have vainly tried many remedies for rheumatism, it will be a wise conclusion to try Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It cures all painful diseases when other medicines fail.

A clergyman who resides not three hundred miles from Walkerton recently preached a farewell sermon before taking a position as chaplain of an asylum for idiots. His text was "I go to prepare a place for you!"—Walkerton Herald.

SURE TO CONQUER.

The most troublesome cough is sure to yield if timely treated with Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam. Pleasent to take and safe for young or old.

For rough conditions of the Skin, Shampooing the head, pimples, Eruption and skin diseases, use Prof. Low's Sulphur Soap.

A GREAT MISTAKE.

It is a great mistake to suppose that dyspepsia can't be cured, but must be endured and life made gloomy and miserable thereby. Alexander Burns, of Cobourg, was cured after suffering fifteen years. Burdock Blood Bitters cured him.

The Michigan Central Depot at Niagara Falls was burned on Monday.

A VALUABLE PATENT.

The most valuable discovery patented in modern times is that of the best blood purifier and liver and kidney regulator known. We refer to Burdock Blood Bitters, which is making so many wonderful cures and bringing the blessed boon of health to so many homes.

Nov. 10th at Duluth, an incendiary fire this destroyed the Onota Lumber Company's saw mill, Osterhout & Hughart's saw mill, fifteen million feet of lumber, four dwelling houses, a store, and other buildings. Loss $200,000

A PERFECT BEAUTY.

Perfect beauty is only attained by pure blood and good health. These acquirements give the possessor a pleasant expression, a fair clear skin and the rosy bloom tone the entire system to a healthy action.

(Original.)

The golden links of friendship
Which bound her heart to mine,
Now are broken, scattered widely,
Hidden 'neath the sands of time.

Oh! the bitter pain and sorrow
Which doth gnaw my aching heart;
Speak of happy hours spent with her,
How we at the gate did part.

Are we parted thus to wander
Up and down this stage of care,
Caring naught for each to-morrow
Whether here or whether there.

Oh! this world seems dark and dreary
When we part with those we love,
When our wanderings here are over
Shall we die to meet above.

O'er the silver domes of childhood
I look back to hear the chime
Raise that air to me the dearest
'Tis the song of "Auld Lang Sine."

When the moonbeam gently rising
Fill the solom air, so bright
With the gladness of the heavens,
I think of that last "Good Night."

DAN MCCAUGHRIN.

THE QUEEN vs. TEETS.—The prisoner was charged with administering poison to his wife. Rossanah Shepherd about one year ago which caused her death. The parties lived near Flesherton, and an inquest was held by Dr. Christoe, and the prisoner committed for trial. The stomach of the deceased was sent to Dr. Ellis, of Toronto, when it was found that it contained strychnine. The prisoner on being arraigned, and in reply to the question "are you Guilty or not Guilty," answered in a firm voice "Not Guilty." The Crown Council, A. Frost, Esq., addressed the Jury, briefly giving a history of the murder. The evidence was circumstantial and went to show that the prisoner had strychnine in his trunk, which he had brought from the United States, and that he was heard to say, while standing by the bead-side of his dead wife "Poor Rossy, it was me caused this," etc. The prisoner had also insured the deceased's life some time previous for $4,000. After hearing the evidence the council for the defence, Mr. Masson, addressed the Jury at length, and was followed by Mr. Frost for the crown, who clearly presented the facts in a short and concise speech. The Judge in summing up the case charged strongly against the prisoner, after which the Jury retired and were absent about half an hour when they returned into court, rendering a yerdict of "Guilty" with recommendation to mercy. The Judge then addressed the prisoner asking him if he had any thing to say why the sentence of the the Court should not be pronounced upon him. The prisoner slowly arose to his feet, and addressed the court at considerable length, protesting his innocence. He said that one of the witnesses Aron Teeter swore falsly. He also denied the statement of Mrs. Leppard, her daughter and daughter-in-law. He said that he had been wrongly dealt with by the people and the press.

His Lordship before passing sentence said he entirely agreed with the verdict of the Jury. He said the prisoner had but a short time to prepare to meet his Maker, and advised him to make the best of his time, as he could not hold out any hope of a reprieve. His Lordship then proceeded to pass the sentence as follows:—The sentence of this Court is that you Cook Teet, be taken from the place from whence you came, and that you there remain until the 5th day of December next, when you are to be taken to the place of execution, and there hanged by the neck till you are dead, and may the Lord have mercy on your soul.

THE QUEEN vs. WYLIE, SPENCER, AND FOX.—The prisoners were charged with assaulting and robbing Thomas Christie, in August last, and were tried before the Police Magistrate and committed for trial. The evidence was given in the Advertiser in full at the time. The prisoners, were found guilty of common assault, and sentenced to six months in the Central Prison. The Grand Jury returned no Bill against H. Cavell. A Frost for the Crown, John Creasor and S. J. Lane for the prisoners.

DOBIE vs. MICHAEL BAY LUMBER CO. An action to recover the value of ties taken by the defendants under right of purchase from an insolvent who had as the plaintiff claimed, previously sold the ties in question to James Sutherland of whose estate he is trustee. Verdict for plaintiff. Creasor & Platt for plaintiff, and — Lount Q. C. of Barrie for defendants.

GIBBON vs. MICHAELS BAY LUMBER CO.—An action to recover value of ties sold to the defendants. The defendants claimed by way of counter claim to be entitled to damages amounting to $600 having been delivered 6 days over length of time. The plaintiff was said to have contracted to have the vessels loaded but failing to supply a sufficient number of men capable to perform the loading of the vessels. Judgement reserved. Creasor and Platt for plaintiff, and — Lount Q. C. for defendant.

GIBBON vs. SIMS.—An action for false arrest and malicious prosecution. The parties are merchants residing at Little Current. The defendant who is a Justice of the Peace caused the plaintiff to be arrested upon the information of one Rooley. That his timber had been taken away by some person unknown, and that the plaintiff had been using timber in building a wharf. The plaintiff after some evidence had been given, and on being asked by the defendant to give bail refused to do so, and was remanded to gaol for one week. Verdict for plaintiff $1000. Creasor & Platt for plaintiff, J. Mason for defendant.

THE QUEEN vs. SCOONS.—The prisoner was charged with the murder of an old woman named Smith last summer. The evidence went to show that he had been living with the deceased and daughter, for some time previous to the occurrence; that some time previous to the death of the deceased she had been drinking and was very quarrelsome; that the night and morning of her death the prisoner had also been drinking and had beaten, and otherwise ill-treated her. The prisoner was found guilty of manslaughter, and sentenced to ten years in the Penitentary. A. Frost for the Crown, Creasor & Platt for the prisoner.

COUPLOND vs. CHARLTON.—An action of seduction. The parties reside in the township of Derby. Verdict of $150 for plaintiff, Creasor & Morrison for Plaintiff, Kilbourn & Bishop for defendant.

LEGARD vs. CARSON.—An action for seduction. The parties reside in the the township of Artemesia. Verdict for plaintiff $800. Frost & Frost for plaintiff, J. Masson for defendant.

REYNOLDS vs. MCDONALD & Co.—An interpleader issue. Verdict for defendant; J. Mason for plaintiff, McLaren for defendant.

The Court then adjourned leaving ten cases to come up for hearing on the 7th of January.

The United States Harvest.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12.—The November returns to the Department of Agricultural state that owing to the long continued drought, the indicated yield of cotton per acre is lower in nearly every State than the average. The lowest yield are in Florida, Georgia, Alabama, and Texas. Indications however, point to a crop somewhat larger than that of 1883, gathered in unusually fine condition. The corn yield exceeds 1,800,000,000 bushels, an average rate of 26 bushels per acre. The best yield is in what has been designated the "Great American Desert." The eleven arid region in the vicinity at the one hundredth meridian have produced heavy crops of maize of high quality. That line of longitude has ceased to be an absolute barrier to corn production or general farming. The New England State averages nearly 33 bushels, New York, 30; Pennsylvania, 31 per acre. The quality of corn is better than in 1883, nearly everywhere, and in the northern belt it is worth 25 to 75 per cent. more. The potato crop is nearly an average yield or ninety bushels per acre, and exceeds 190,000,000 bushels The value of domestic breadstuff exported during October is $11,541,000.

Hanlan and Beach.

Mrs, Hanlan has just received a letter from Ned giving an account of his race with Beach and the way which it was lost. He states that the wonder was not that he lost the race but that he was not killed. Beach cut fairly across his boat, and Hanlan says that only a tremondus pull with the right oar, which partially strained his wrist, saved him from being run down. As it was his boat became fairly water logged, and it was only with great difficulty that he could keep afloat long enough to cross the line. Even then, he says, he believes he would have won had he not been forced about a quarter of a mile out of his course from one cause and another.

Ruddick of Boston has just shipped two new boats to Hanlan. They were packed in wadding and then enclosed in wooden cases and shipped to London. Mr. Whitefoot of the Sportsman will there tranship them to the Australion line of steamers, and they will reach the antipodes about January 1. Hanlan will not probably row another race until the new boats reach him. The shells are of the same pattern as those he has been using lately and cost $125 each.—News

They all want Farms.

"I can assure you," said a leading real etate agent to a reporter yesterday "that the value of property will be raised in those counties in which the Scott Act has been passed. The great majority of those who came to us for farms want them in Scott Act counties. The demand is especially great for farms in Oxford, Halton, Huron, and Norfolk. There is one man who came from the States and purchased a farm in Halton because the act was in force there. Another man bought a farm there, and was so pleased he induced a relative to do likewise. Even anti-temperance men prefer to locate in these counties. The farmers in Halton say that business is much better now. As a proof of this there are three new stores in the town of Milton. The store keepers say that they are now doing a fine cash business. In Halton County gaol there is only one prisoner, and that is Zimmerman, an hotel-keeper, who is serving two months for a third breach of the Scott act.

Two Thieves Captured

IN A BARN IN HOLLAND, NEAR BERKELEY.

About two weeks ago Joseph Gawley, a boy of 13 summers, caught two owls in a trap. The feathered thieves had been making the poultry scarce, so the young fellow determined to put a stop to their unwelcome visits, and set a trap with the above result. The boy had his prisoners in a cage exhibiting them in Markdale last week.

NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER XII.

An hour passed, and still the conversation was kept up with unflagging interest. All Lady Jesmond's power of fascination were brought into play. Once or twice his lordship turned to me with some commonplace remark, and at one bright smile from her he instantly forgot me. We were still out on the balcony, Lord Saxon seated by her side, whilst I stood gazing at the roses with a faint sad heart. What had happened that the light had seemed to have left the sun and the fragrance to have fled from the flowers?

Lord Saxon was "a lover of beauty and a dreamer of dreams"—I knew it—and, now that he had met with a woman of surpassing loveliness, he would worship at her shrine. Why need I mind? With a smile on my face I stood there whilst my heart was slowly breaking; for I new, just as well as if they had disclosed their thoughts, that a passionate mutual love was burning in their hearts. He could never have loved me; it had been but a passing fancy. That woman had stormed his heart with her beauty, and he had surrendered,

When the feeling of pain had somewhat moderated, I heard what they were saying.

"Not ride!" cried Lord Saxon. "I thought all ladies rode in India!"

"I was an exception," she said. "It is the one accomplishment above all others that I miss."

"Let me teach you," he begged eagerly.

"You would not like the trouble," she said coquettishly.

"Trouble!" he repeated. "Why, it would give me the greatest pleasure and delight."

"We will speak of it later," she said.

Then came an interruption, in the shape of a message from the nursery, saying that Mrs. Rivers would be glad if Lady Jesmond would go there at once, as Sir Guy did not seem well.

Nello and I were left on the balcony alone. He had come to talk to me of the silvery moon and the nightingale's song. Alas, alas his eyes followed Lady Jesmond, and, when she had vanished from his sight, he stood with a dreamy, musing smile on his lips.

"He is a dreamer of dreams," I said to myself, whilst a bitter pain seized my heart; "and now they are of her, not of me."

"Felicia:" he said, turning to me, "I cannot tell you how grieved and distressed I am at your sudden reversal of fortune. I could hardly believe my eyes when I read my mother's letter, and found that Jesmond Dene was no longer yours. Do you feel the loss greatly?"

His words were kind enough, but the very kindness was as a dagger thrust into my heart; it showed me how completely his love was dead.

The loss of Jesmond Dene was so trifling to me in comparison with this other and greater loss that I could have laughed at the question; but I answered it soberly enough.

"I felt it most deeply; but I do not resent it. I loved my cousin Paul, and I am glad that his son will have the estate."

"You are very noble and very good," he said, "I have thought a great deal about it, and I cannot express to you how glad I am to see you carry such a brave heart, Felicia. Have you decided yet what you will do?"

I could have cried out in my anguish that I had hoped, had thought that he was coming to settle my future for me; but I shrouded myself in a mantle of pride. If his love for me was so weak that it had died at sight of a fairer face.. what had it been worth?

I told him I had decided on nothing—that for the present I should remain with Lady Jesmond, as she had asked me; also that my aunt was too ill to be removed.

"I should like to see your cousin Paul's little son," he said. "Certainly his widow is the most beautiful woman I have ever seen."

"And you worship beauty," I remarked, bitterly.

How deaf he was to the anguish that rang in my voice! He laughed frankly, apparently unaware of the pain he had caused me.

"So my mother said, Felicia; and I am afraid it is true. But I want to talk to you of yourself."

When Lady Jesmond returned to the room, laughing at the nurse's anxiety and unnecessary alarm, he immediately left me, and the next moment I heard him beseeching Lady Jesmond to drive over to Dunroon.

"I should like to show you the place," he said. Felicia will drive over with you."

"I will think about it," answered Lady Jesmond. "I never make hurried promises."

"Felicia," cried Lord Saxon, "you will bring Lady Jesmond over to Dunroon?"

"When she likes to go," I answered.

And then Lord Saxon rose to depart. He really must go, he said; he had stayed much longer than he ought. But even after that declaration he lingered, talking to her, and watching her every movement with admiring eyes.

So this was the prosaic end of my love-story! Had he cared for me? I could not tell; but I believed he had, or he would not have kissed me. He had loved me with a feeble apology for love which had died when he saw the fair face of Lady Jesmond. I had tasted happiness but to lose it; I had dreamed my love-dream but to wake and find it vanished. I had been unspeakably happy for a few days, and now, without any warning, the cup of happiness had been dashed from my lips, the blissful delusion had been dispelled.

When Lord Saxon had gone, Lady Jesmond turned to me.

"Felicia," she cried, "you are a greater mystery to me than ever. Imagine knowing such a man as that and never speaking of him! You must be as unimpressionable as marble."

"You never liked Lady Saxon," I made excuse.

"It did not follow that I should not like her son," she said, and then added, "I have a presentiment that I shall become his wife."

"You must wait until he asks you," I ventured to suggest.

"Yes; and I can make him ask when ever I liked,' she said laughingly. "Why, Felicia, do you not see?"

"See what!" I asked impatiently.

"Why, that he is in love with me from the first moment that we met! I felt it; I am sure of it. And, Felicia, Felicia, I am afraid my own case is like his! He is the first man I have seen whom I should care to love or marry."

"You forget Paul," I said, shocked at her words.

"I do not forget him. But, Felicia why did you never speak to me of Lord Saxon?"

"How could I tell the topic would interest you?" I asked.

"You might have been sure, knowing what a superior man he is. Now I shall cultivate his mother's friendship, and, Felicia, you will take me to Dunroon?"

CHAPTER XIII.

A year passed, and to me it was of slow torturing agony. My strength deserted me, the colour faded from my cheeks, the light from my eyes; but I kept my secret. No one, except perhaps Lady Saxon, had the faintest idea that I had ever cared for the handsome Lord of Dunroon.

It was impossible for me not to watch Nello and Lady Jesmond as they sauntered amid the trees and flowers, her bright lovely face and golden hair contrasting with dark, proud, manly beauty. Never was lover more devoted than Lord Saxon. He came every day, sometimes twice; and I could hear his voice calling "Gabrielle, Gabrielle!" as he sought her in the grounds. He was proud of her love, and he gloried in her brilliant beauty. If by any chance he came when she was engaged or absent, she would pour out all his passionate loving thoughts to me. Lashings from a fiery whip could not have stung me more; but I listened with a smile on my lips, though every word lacerated my heart. As for Lady Jesmond, she gave herself up completely to her love-dream.

"I talked of ambition once," she said to me; "I never could have had any. I would marry Lord Saxon if he were a peasant instead of a prince, as he is."

"Do you love him so much," I asked.

"Love him," she exclaimed, with a warm glow on her face—"I love him? That is a weak expression, Felicia. It is something deeper and stronger than simple love, I always knew, she continued, "that if I ever loved at all, it would be in terrible earnest. I wish I had more moderation and greater self-control."

They were acknowledged lovers when she spoke in that enthusiastic fashion; but no time had been settled for the marriage. My aunt Annette was still lying ill, and Lady Saxon was miserable.

"I do not like Lady Jesmond," she said to me one day when we were alone; "I never liked her, and I never shall. I do not trust her. There is something strange and mysterious in her manner which repels even more than her glittering loveliness. I am anxious that my son should be happy; but I wish he had chosen differently;" she concluded, with a sigh.

I could not help noting that there were times when Lady Jesmond seemed unhappy, when she was restless and uneasy, and started at the least sound, grew pale when she heard an unusual noise. I found her at intervals, with her face clouded in thought and her bright blue eyes shadowed. It struck me that she spent much more time with Mrs. Rivers than she had hitherto done. They were in constant and close companionship, always talking eagerly, earnestly, and in whispers. Two other things struck me as extremely singular—how little thought Lady Jesmond bestowed upon her dead husband and how little love she showed for her child. All her interest centered in Lord Saxon.

The month of June came round again, and still I was an inmate of Jesmond Dene. I could not leave, first, because I had solemnly promised to remain for a time, and secondly because my aunt Annette, who was lying ill with a spinal complaint, could hardly endure my being out of her presence. All nature smiled in the summer sun, and the nightingales once again awoke the echoes of the night with their melodious song.

At the close of a sultry day, when the moon was shining over the trees, I went quietly to hear the nightingales, as I had once gone with Nello. Bitter were my thoughts, hot and bitter were my tears. She had taken him from me, this beautiful woman whose little son had robbed me of my inheritance.

It was a luxury to be alone, to pour forth unrestrainedly the agony of my heart, to crouch down on the long soft grass and sob out my grief. They were singing so exquisitely, the nightingales, and yet the sweet music seemed to tear my very heart. He would have loved and married me but for her! Heaven forgive me—in that moment I hated her! Ah, if she had but remained in India—if my cousin Paul had but lived! and the plaint of Bianca among the nightingales came home to me.

She had not reached him at my heart,
With her fine tongue, as snakes indeed
Kill flies; nor had I, for my part,
Yearned after, in my desperate need,
And followed him, as he did her,
To coasts left bitter by the tide,
Whose very nightingale, elsewhere
Delighting, torture and deride.
For still they sing, the nightingales

"I would not for her white and pink,
Though such he likes, her grace of limb,
Though such he has praised, nor yet I think,
For life itself, though spent with him,
Commit such sacrilege, affront
God's nature, which is love, intrude
'Twixt two affianced souls, and hunt
Like spiders in the altar wood.
I cannot bear those nightingales!

"If she chose sin, some gentler guise
She might have sinned in, so it seems.
She might have pricked out both my eyes,
And I still see him in my dreams,
Or drugged me in my soup or wine,
Nor left me angry afterward.
To die here with his hand in mine,
His breath upon me, were not hard.
Our Lady, hush those nightingales!

" ....Sing they so,
And you be silent? Do I speak,
And you not hear? An arm you throw
Round some one, and I feel so weak.
Oh, owl-like birds! They sing for spite,
They sing for hate, they sing for doom;
They'll sing through death, who sing through night
They'll sing and stun me in the tomb—
The nightingales, the nightingales!"

In the madness of my despair I realised how much I had loved him. He would be standing now on the balcony with her; he would be worshipping the beauty of her fair face, his arm encircling her waist, and he would kiss her lovely lips. And I was lying there, lonely, desolate, and broken-hearted! Was it just? I cried to the silent shining heavens. She had everything. She had had the trusting love of my bright young cousin; she was the mother of his heir; she was mistress of the house that had been mine; she had money, lands; and now she had taken him! Was it fair, because she had the brightness of the stars in her eyes and the sheen of the sun in her hair, that she should take him from me? Was it fair that she should stand in the circle of his arm, and I lie forsaken there? Was it fair that she should take his caresses and his kisses while I stretched out my arms to the empty air?

CHAPTER XIV.

There was a surprise in store for me when I returned from my dismal ramble. I found that Lord Saxon had remained rather later than usual, and that Lady Jesmond had discarded her widow's weeds. Never shall I forget the vision of loveliness that met my dazed eyes. She wore a dress of pale violet velvet, which contrasted well with her golden tresses and exquisite complexion. I had seen, not many days before, Lord Saxon take the little crape cap from her head, and all her shining hair fall in a golden mass of ripples and waves about her shapely shoulders.

"It is more than a sin to cover such hair," he said.

She looked up at him with sudden gravity.

"I hope," she answered calmly, "that I shall never commit a greater."

"I do not think you could commit a sin if you tried," he said, his eyes looking into hers with deep yearning love; and, to my surprise, instead of smiling, her gravity deepened.

The remembrance of her dazzling beauty of that evening will never leave me. I remember, too, how she sang to him, and how he leaned admiringly over her chair and drank in the music of her sweet voice; and then they went out on to the balcony, where he bade her good night, bending down and kissing her lips, and breathing passionate words into her ears which seemed to stir her into new life.

Then he was gone; and she stood gazing after him with a smile sweet and tender, such as I had seldom seen on her face before.

We stood together once more; her face was full of emotion, her eyes were full of tears of joy.

"I will be a good woman my whole life long," she said suddenly, "I will be as good a woman can be; for, oh, Felicia, I am so happy—I am so unutterably happy! Do you know what has happened?"

"No," I answered faintly; but my heart told me what was coming.

Two warm soft arms were placed round my neck, a golden head nestled on my bosom, a fair bewitching face was turned to mine, tears shone in the blue eyes.

"Listen to me, Felicia," she said. "I am the happiest woman in the whole wide world. Oh, I will be good—I will indeed be good!"

"But you are good now, Gabrielle," I said, anxious only to avert the coming announcement.

"I will be better!" she cried. "Oh, Felicia, I do not deserve to be so happy!"

The white arms tightened their clasp and the beautiful head nestled more closely to me.

"I shall remember to-day above all other days," she said; "it is the happiest of my life. Felicia, I am shy at telling you my good news. Lord Saxon has asked me to be his wife, and wishes me to marry him this summer."

There was a dead silence as her voice died away; the smile on her face was full of unutterable content.

The blow which I had so long expected had at last fallen. I must go away, far away, where I could never hear of or see either of them again!

"This summer," she repeated; "and, now that my happiness is so near, I—I am afraid of it—afraid!" she repeated, raising her face and kissing me. "Can you say anything that will give me courage?"

"You have nothing to fear," I said, with difficulty.

"Is it colder than usual to night?" she asked. "The air is sweet with roses, but it seems to me chill;" and I felt a shudder pass over the graceful figure. "I wish," she added, with sudden melancholy, "that I had my life to begin over again. All people make grave mistakes at one time or another in their lives, do they not?"

"Very many do," I replied—who had made a greater one than I? "But surely you are not among the number, Gabrielle—you can have made no mistake in your life?"

She looked at me with wistful longing eyes.

"I did not know," she said, "that pure love brought so much with it. I find the first thing is a craving to be worthy of it."

"I hope you are worthy of it," I answered gravely. Her curious words and manner began to make me feel anxious

"I will try to be," she said. "Felicia," she continued, drawing my face down to hers and kissing it again, "you have known Nello longer than I have; do you think, if he loved any one very much, and found out that she he loved had done a great wrong, he would forgive readily?"

"It would depend altogether on the nature of the wrong committed," I replied. "I should imagine that he would be ready to overlook ordinary faults and weaknesses; but there are some things that he would never pardon."

"What are they?" she asked breathlessly.

"He hates trickery and deceit," I answered. "He would, I believe, almost forgive murder sooner than anything of that nature."

She was looking at me with wide-opened frightened eyes.

"He would sooner forgive murder than deceit!" she echoed.

The words had a strange sound as she uttered them, and made a lasting impression upon me.

"I am sure it is cold," she remarked, after a pause; and once again she shuddered.

She began to pace up and down the long drawing-room.

"You will think that I am behaving strangely to night," she said. "I am uneasy; I cannot rest."

I attempted to go, but she cried out, "Felicia, do not leave me!"

"It is strange," she said presently, with rare humility, "that out of all the world of women Nello should have chosen me."

"I do not think so," I replied quickly. "He loves you because you are one of the most beautiful."

She looked sad and disappointed.

"Do you think it is only for my beauty that he loves me?" she asked.

"Would not that content you?" I inquired.

"Not now," she answered slowly. "It would once; it will not satisfy me now. Love has opened my eyes to a hundred things I did not know before."

"You really do not seem to have loved my cousin," I was startled into saying.

"No," she replied—and her eyes filled with tears,"—"I did not love Paul—not in this fashion, at least."

Then I advised her to go to rest. Her face was burning her eyes were shining with a strange light, her golden hair had fallen over her shoulders in careless profusion. Never was vision of womanhood so fair!

"I am so loath to see the happiest day of my life come to an end," she said, "that I feel compelled to linger here. Felicia, have you ever had what people call a presentiment?"

"Yes, often," I answered.

"Have they been realized?" she asked.

"More often than not," I replied.

"I have a presentiment to-night—a feeling that tells me to morrow will not be like to-day"

"You will be happier than ever to-morrow," I said. "Lord Saxon will come over to Jesmond Dene quite early, and will want to drive you or ride with you to one of your favourite haunts. Than you will romp on the staircase with little Guy; you will go off in excellent spirits; and you will have quite forgotten your presentiment when you return"

"Good night, Felicia," she said; "you have comforted me."

I kissed her, and said "Good night."

When I awoke the next morning, my first thought was that I must go from Jesmond Dene. I could not bear to remain in the place that had seen my hopes crushed and my love ruthlessly blasted.

Just as I had prophesied, Lord Saxon came over quite early, as he wanted to drive Lady Jesmond to St. Michael's Priory, a fine ruin about ten miles distant.

"A whole day my, darling, out in the sunshine together!" I heard him say.

They went to the nursery, whence I heard issue peals of sweet childish laughter. I went after them with a message for Lady Jesmond. Lord Saxon was tossing the child in his arms, delighting and frightening him at the same time. Lady Jesmond was speaking to the nurse at the other end of the room and again I caught the words, "Be careful, Gabrielle;" and once more I wondered why the nurse should presume so to address her mistress.

Nello and Lady Jesmond rode away together, and there was no shadow on her lovely laughing face as she wished me a pleasant "Good morning,"

Two Popular Singers.

Mrs. Agnes Corlett-Thomson, who will be remembered by many of our readers as Miss Corlett, is rapidly coming to the front as a singer of much more than average merit. Her voice is a pure, sweet "stoccato" soprano, particularly strong, and marked with a fullness of tone and purity of production but seldom met with. She is also a good type of an ideal Canadian, rich in good health, with that bright and clear complexion characteristic of her countrywomen. Last May she married Mr. J. F. Thomson, a baritone of whom Canada may well be proud. As yet a young man, he has has already filled engagements with a number of high class opera and concert Companies. It was with the Strakosch and Litta Companies that his greatest successes were made. While with them he appeared with such great artists as Marie Roze, Torriani, Annandale, Litta, Brignoli, Taglispietra, Kellogg, Carey, Perugini, Conly, etc. The Boston Herald in speaking of his debut there said: "Another debutant, Mr. J. F. Thomson, scored the success of the evening by his artistic singing. He possesses a magnificent baritone voice of over two octaves in compass, particularly strong and pure, even in all its registers and highly cultivated, which he uses with great taste and expression. His numbers were "The Torreador Song" (Carmen) and "Si tu Savais" (Balfe.) He was enthusiastically encored after each, and his number given in response, "Good Company" Adams), and "Awake" by the same composer, but increased the good impression his first selections excited."

Mr. and Mrs. Thompson, remain in Toronto until the spring, when they expect to go to New York, and finish their musical studies.

One of Froude's Stories of Carlyle.

It is no exaggeration to say that if one of the stories in Froude's "Thomas Carlyle" had been published during the historian's life no woman, unless possibly one of his kinsfolk as hard as himself, would ever have spoken to him again. His wife, suffering from the combined effects of chronic neuralgia and a terrible fall, with the nerves and muscles of one side entirely disabled lay on her bed, unable to close her mouth. He came into her room, looked at her, while he leaned against the mantelpiece—an act intensely irritating to a woman not vain, indeed, but proudly desirous not to look ill—and said: "Jane, ye had better shut your mouth. Jane, ye'll find yourself in a more compact and pious frame of mind if ye shut your mouth." That Mrs. Carlyle endured this gibe and afterwards remained near the man who inflicted it upon her, says much for her constancy; but no woman who reads its crude brutality can afterwards be open to conviction that there was anything good about Carlyle.

The Dunce's Cap in the East.

A party of scientific travellers who had gone out to Egypt to examine the Pyramid spent a portion of their time in visiting the public elementary schools in Cairo. What was their surprise to see a European "stove-pipe" hat hanging on the wall in almost every school-room. In reply to the interpreter's inquiry, one of the teachers said that the most efficacious punishment for refractory boys was to be compelled to wear the hat.—[Deutsche Hutmacher Zeitung.

Another Life Saved.

About two years ago, a prominent citizen of Chicago was told by his physicians that he must die. They said his system was so debilitated that there was nothing left to build on. He made up his mind to try a "new departure." He got some of Dr. Pierce's "Golden Medical Discovery" and took it according to directions. He began to improve at once. He kept up the treatment for some months, and is to-day a well man. He says the "Discovery" saved his life.

Fall Work With Poultry

On most farms, chickens as soon ... are old enough to leave their chicken ... coops, take to trees, sheds, or ... rather than to the poultry-houses. ... cases it is best that they make ... tion for their health and comfort ... soon as the leaves fall, or the driving ... storms of Autumn sweep through the ... sheds, it is time to get them in ... warm, winter houses. Some pests ... these pests lice, but they are of ... family; are nocturnal, like bed bugs, ... ing the birds and taking to ... woodwork of any kind in day-time.

The next thing is to see that the ... have a dust-bath to keep their body ... from lice, as these breed and keep ... fowls. The Dairyman's Best Way for Increasing Profits.

Of the various ways through which ... possible for the average dairyman to ... hance his profits, the most effectual is ... duce the cost of producing his milk. ... he can do in a variety of ways. One ... of doing so lies in the improvement of ... milking stock. This is a certain but ... way, and must be the work of years. ... more rapid way, and one that can be at ... made available, consists in reducing ... cost of keeping his cows. This he may ... in different ways: first, by securing ... warmth and more comfort for his herd ... winter. The heaviest item of expense ... which he incurs consists in the cost of ... tering his cows, and the more they are ... posed to the cold, the heavier that item ... comes. Animals eat more in winter than ... summer, simply because more heat is ... sorbed from their bodies by the colder ... just as a hot iron will cool faster on a ... day than on a warm one. As the animal ... heat must be kept up to a uniform standard, ... the extra loss of warmth must be ... stored by taking in more fuel in the form ... food, and this increases the cost of keeping ... and the cost of producing the season's milk. ... Keep the cows warm, and they will eat ... more in winter than in summer; and ... will require less and less extra food in winter, ... just in proportion as they are kept ... warm and comfortable, and by just so much ... they will turn out milk at a reduced ... pense.

There is profit in keeping cows warm ... winter. It costs much less to tone ... the cold of our severe climate by providing ... warm buildings for the herd once in a ... time, than to furnish extra food year ... year to restore heat needlessly lost by ... posure to cold air. I do not know ... dairyman who could not do something ... this direction toward reducing the cost ... his milk, and I believe it is possible ... most dairymen to reduce the cost of ... keep one-third. I have seen this done ... several men who thought they were treating ... their stock pretty well before they began ... making a special effort in this direction.

There is but one other source of needless ... expense in the production of milk, which ... approximates in magnitude the waste of ... fodder from exposure to cold; and that is ... the lack of a full and steady supply of ... milk-producing food through the whole ... the milking season, less than ten per cent ... of the very intelligent dairy public of New ... York having foresight enough to provide ... against even a short midsummer drouth. ... Between a lack of food in summer and ... sufficient protection in winter, the cost ... milk is made something like twice as great ... as it need be. Let the cows be so well ... in summer that there shall be no shrinkage ... in their milk, except from the natural ... cause due to the time of coming in; ... since their keep to a minimum by comfort ... in winter, and there is money in dairying. ... It is a better, as well as a more effective ... way of enhancing profits, than by endeavoring to raise the price of dairy products, ... that diminishes consumption by increasing

FOR THE FARMER.

Fall Work With Poultry.

On most farms, chickens as soon as they are old enough to leave their chickenhood coops, take to trees, sheds, or anywhere rather than to the poultry-houses. In most cases it is best that they make such a selection for their health and comfort; but as soon as the leaves fall, or the driving cold storms of Autumn sweep through the open sheds, it is time to get them into their warm winter houses. The first step towards preparing to winter the stock, is to see that the poultry-houses are all perfectly clean. All impurities that may have accumulated during the summer, in corners or nests, when the houses are not so much used, must be removed. The houses should be fumigated with sulphur and tobacco stems, burned indoors, and while all openings and crevices are tightly stopped. Then a coat of whitewash, with a little carbolic acid in it, should be applied to walls and to all boxes, nests, and everything in the house, and the perches should be treated to a coat of benzine and carbolic acid. All this is the work of time; but it will pay well, for by these means the fowls will come into healthful quarters free from vermin. Without such precaution, hen mites are sure to afflict the stock. Some people call these pests lice, but they are of the mite family; are nocturnal, like bed bugs, leaving the birds and taking to perches or woodwork of any kind in day-time.

The next thing is to see that the fowls have a dust-bath to keep their bodies free from lice, as these breed and keep on the fowls. The only way to keep or get rid of them, is to keep a good bath of sand and ashes—wood ashes when they can be procured—and the birds are only too glad to do their part to cleanse themselves. There are many kinds of lice on fowls, some living entirely on the feathers; others on the bodies; some keep about the heads; others only appear when dirt accumulates about the bodies. When a fowl gets sick, these parasites accumulate rapidly, principally because the bird relaxes that activity which is necessary to keep itself clean. The dust-bath should be close to a low window, so that the sun will shine directly upon it. A box sunk till its edges are level with the floor, will tempt the fowls better than one on the floor, as some fowls will not use it in that position.

Early pullets will lay about this time, and it is well to observe which lays the earliest and keep it up, so as to be able to select these as hens for breeding purposes. A very important thing to attend to is to see that no half-grown or stunted, sickly chickens are admitted into the houses with the flock, or they may communicate disease to the whole lot; better kill off all such birds, even if you have to bury them. All broken windows or holes that will let in cold, should be promptly repaired, so that ventilation can be controlled by the proper arrangements. It is well also to see that the birds from different roosting places agree when put together for the first time. Those who have gone through the annoyance of driving in a large flock of chickens to their houses in the fall, can appreciate the trouble. It is best for a number of persons to surround them, drawing closer and closer to the house. The chickens should see their way, and learn to go in; if taken off the trees and carried in, they do not learn their way, and the operation has to be repeated a number of times before the birds will learn to go in of their own accord.

The Dairyman's Best Way for Enhancing Profits.

Of the various ways through which it is possible for the average dairyman to enhance his profits, the most effectual is to reduce the cost of producing his milk. This he can do in a variety of ways. One means of doing so lies in the improvement of his milking stock. This is a certain but slow way, and must be the work of years. A more rapid way, and one that can be at once made available, consists in reducing the cost of keeping his cows. This he may do in different ways: first, by securing greater warmth and more comfort for his herd in winter. The heaviest item of expense which he incurs consists in the cost of wintering his cows, and the more they are exposed to the cold, the heavier that item becomes. Animals eat more in winter than in summer, simply because more heat is absorbed from their bodies by the colder air, just as a hot iron will cool faster on a cold day than on a warm one. As the animal heat must be kept up to a uniform standard, the extra loss of warmth must be restored by taking in more fuel in the form of food, and this increases the cost of keeping and the cost of producing the season's milk. Keep the cows warm, and they will eat no more in winter than in summer; and they will require less and less extra food in winter, just in proportion as they are made warm and comfortable, and by just so much they will turn out milk at a reduced expense.

There is profit in keeping cows warm in winter. It costs much less to tone down the cold of our severe climate by providing warm buildings for the herd once in a lifetime, than to furnish extra food year after year to restore heat needlessly lost by exposure to cold air. I do not know of a dairyman who could not do something in this direction toward reducing the cost of his milk, and I believe it is possible for most dairymen to reduce the cost of winter keep one-third. I have seen this done by several men who thought they were treating their stock pretty well before they began making a special effort in this direction.

There is but one other source of needless expense in the production of milk, which approximates in magnitude the waste of fodder from exposure to cold; and that is, the lack of a full and steady supply of good milk-producing food through the whole of the milking season, less than ten per cent. of the very intelligent dairy public of New York having foresight enough to provide against even a short midsummer drought. Between a lack of food in summer and insufficient protection in winter, the cost of milk is made something like twice as great as it need be. Let the cows be so well fed in summer that there shall be no shrinkage in their milk, except from the natural decrease due to the time of coming in; and reduce their keep to a minimum by comfort in winter, and there is money in dairying. It is a better, as well as a more effectual way of enhancing profits, than by endeavoring to raise the price of dairy products, as this diminishes consumption by increasing the burden of consumers; and a very much better way than by waging a war of doubtful justice with cheap substitutes for dairy products, which could not exist if the bottom cost of genuine products were touched. It is a good time now to think of this matter before it is to late to prepare for the coming winter.—[Rural New Yorker.

Shelters for Sheep.

A writer in La Semaines des Constructeurs, referred to by the American Architect as "the clever 'architect of the beasts,'" discusses the proper way of building shelters for sheep. The following brief summary of his suggestions is given by the Architect:

"The first criticism that he makes upon the ordinary close sheds used for the purpose, is that they are not sufficiently ventilated for the health of the sheep. In Norway, it is said, as well as in Holland, which has a much colder climate than France or England, sheep live out of doors the year round without inconvenience; but where merino or other sheep of delicate constitution are kept, they should be provided with a cover to protect them from the heat of the sun in summer, and in winter from rain and wet snow, which soak their fleeces, and often chill them fatally.

"The sheds for this purpose may with advantage be closed with a wall on the north side, but left either entirely open, or shelered with louvre boards, on the south. If built thus, they can be kept dry and wholesome throughout the year. The doors of such buildings, especially, should be very wide, and ought to open by sliding.

"Sheep, in going in or coming out of their houses, crowd upon each other, all trying to get out at once; and in the crush the lambs are sometimes killed, while the sheep nearest the sides of the doorway are pushed against the timbers or stones, and often leave tufts of their wool on the sharp edges, or suffer bruises. To prevent this in part, the 'architect of the beasts' recommends that the jambs should be provided with vertical rollers to prevent friction and facilitate the movements of the sheep nearest the side.

"With the same idea of preventing the crushing of the animals against the jambs, a platform, of the same width as the door, may be placed in on each side of it, slightly ascending to the threshold, which is raised. With these, the crowding in the opening cannot take place, as the sheep at the edges of the platform are pushed off before they reach the door.

"In allotting space for housing a flock, it may be useful to remember that the shorter diameter of a sheep, or the space he occupies when eating, side by side with others, is about twenty inches, while the average length is about five feet. The rack generally used for feeding measures about nineteen inches in width, so that twenty inches by six feet seven inches, will be the space required for each animal while standing and eating."

Wintering Plants in Cellars.

Many plants, such as agaves (century plants,) oleanders, large cactuses, etc., that have grown too large to be accomodated in the sitting room or conservatory, can be successfully wintered in any moderately dry, frost-proof cellar. After placing these large plants in the cellar, it will not be necessary to give them any water, the object being to keep them dormant all winter, which can be done by keeping the soil as dry as possible, but not so dry as to allow the plants to shrivel, or become withered. Large plants of this kind mentioned, often form desirable ornaments during the summer time. It is impracticable, in most cases, to bring them into the house, in winter, but they can be kept for years by cellaring through the winter as stated. Large geranium salvia, and heliotrope roots, and even tea-roses, and carnations, can be kept moderately well in the cellar by trenching them in dry, or moderately moist sand. Thus many choice specimens of these plants that we are loth to pull up and throw away when winter approaches can be successfully kept over till next season. It is a needless expense to purchase a stock of new plants for the garden every year, when we can winter many of the old ones in this simple and inexpensive manner. The leaves of all deciduous plants should be removed before they are put away in this manner. The foliage should remain on the oleanders and carnations through the winter.—[American Agriculturist for October.

Tranquility.

Probably nothing tires one so much as feeling hurried. When, in the early morning the day's affairs press on one's attention beforehand, and there comes the wonder how in the world everything is to be accomplished—when every interruption is received impatiently and the clock is watched in distress as its moments flit past—then the mind tires the body. We are wrong to drive ourselves with whip and spur in this way. Each of us is promised strength for the day, and we must not wear ourselves out. If only we can keep cool and calm we shall be less wearied when we have reached the eventide. The children may be fractious, the servants trying, the friend we love may fail to visit us, the letter we expect may not arrive; but if we can preserve our tranquility of soul and demeanor we shall get through everything creditably.

Life's Discipline.

It is not the best thing—that is, the things we call best—that make men. It is not pleasant things; it is not the calm experience of life. It is life's rugged experiences, its tempests, its trials. The discipline of life is here good and there evil, here trouble and there joy, here roughness and there smoothness, one working with the other; and the alterations of the one and the other which necessitate adaptions constitute a part of that educatien which makes man a man in distinction from an animal, which has no education. The successful man invariably bears on his brow the marks of the struggle which he has had to undergo.

The cholera epidemic in Paris is emptying the hotels. Only eighteen families remain at the Grand, and American habitues are preparing to leave at once. The ambulance service is inefficient and is being enlarged, and fumigating corps are being organized. The weather is mild and foggy. It is admitted that the water supply is generally defective, and that it is charged with organic matter. The epidemic is increasing.

A Western Doctor's Story.

My name is Anthony Hunt. I am a drover and live miles and miles away upon the Western prairies. There wasn't a house in sight when I first moved there, my wife and I, and now we have not many nighbors, though those we have are good ones.

One day, about ten years ago, I went away from home to sell some fifty head of cattle—fine creatures as I ever saw. I was to buy some groceries and dry goods before I came back; and above all a doll for our youngest, Dolly. She had never had a store doll of her own—only rag babies her mother had made her.

Dolly could talk nothing else, and went down to the very gate to call after me to get a big one. Nobody but a parent can understand how full my mind was of that toy, and how, when the cattle were sold, the first thing I hurried off to buy was Dolly's doll. I found a large one with eyes that would open and shut when you pulled a wire, and had it wrapped up in a paper and tucked it under my arm while I had the parcels of calico and delaine and tea and sugar put up. Then, late as it was, I started for home. It might have been prudent to stay until morning, but I felt anxious to get back and eager to hear Dolly's praises about her doll.

I was mounted on a steady going old horse and pretty well loaded. Night set in before I was a mile from town, and settled down as dark as pitch while I was in the middle of the darkest bit of road I knew of. I could have felt my way through, I remembered it so well; and when the storm that had been brewing broke, and pelted the rain in torrents, I was five miles or maybe six miles from home.

I rode as fast as I could, but all of a sudden I heard a little cry like a child's voice. I stopped short and listened. I heard it again. I called and it answered me. I couldn't see a thing; all was as dark as pitch. I got down and felt around in the grass—called again, and again was answered. Then I began to wonder. I'm not timid, but I was known to be a drover and to have money about me. It might be a trap to catch me unawares and rob and murder me. I am not superstitious, not very, but how could a real child be out on the prairie in such a night, at such an hour? It might be more than human. The bit of a coward that hides itself in most men showed itself to me then, but once more I heard the cry, and said I:

"If any man's child is hereabouts, Anthony Hunt is not the man to let it die."

I searched again. At last I bethought me of a hollow under the hill and groped that way. Sure enough, I found a little dripping thing that moaned and sobbed as I took it in my arms. I called my horse and the beast came to me and I mounted and tucked the little soaked thing under my coat as well as I could, promising to take it home to mamma. It seemed so tired, and pretty soon cried itself to sleep on my bosom.

It had slept there over an hour when I saw my own windows. There were lights in them, and I supposed my wife had lit them for my sake; but when I got into the doorway I saw something was the matter, and stood still with a dread fear of heart five minutes before I could lift the latch. At last I did it, and saw the room full of neighbors, and my wife amid them weeping. When she saw me she hid her face.

"Oh, don't tell him," she said, "It will kill him."

"What is it, neighbors?" I cried.

"Nothing, now, I hope. What's that you have in your arms?"

"A poor, lost child," said I; "I found it on the road. Take it, will you? I've turned faint." And I lifted the sleeping thing and saw the face of my own child, my Dolly.

It was my own darling, and none other, that I picked up on the drenched road. My little child had wandered out to meet papa and the doll, while the mother was at work, and they were lamenting her as one dead. I thanked Heaven on my knees before them.

It is not much of a story, neighbors, but I think of it often in the nights and wonder how I could bear to live now if I had not stopped when I heard the cry of help upon the road, hardly louder than a squirrel's chirp.

That's Dolly yonder with her mother in the meadow—a girl worth saving—I think (but, then, I'm her father and partial, maybe), the prettiest and sweetest thing this side of the Mississippi.—Philadelphia News.

Amusing Printers' Errors.

The unlucky poet who wrote:

See the pale martyr in his sheet of fire!

must have been completely crushed when the line appeared as:

See the pale martyr in his shirt of fire.

We can sympathize also with the poet who, writing of his love, asserted that he had "kissed her under the silent stars," and found the compositor made him state that he "kicked her under the cellar stairs." True, it has been doubted if these two poets ever existed; but others, of less mythologic fame, have suffered as badly at the hands of the printer. Burns, in a cheap edition of his works, is made to say:

Oh, gin my love were yon red nose,

A well-known temperance lecturer was indignant at finding the sentiment ascribed to him that "drunkenness was jolly," whereas he had declared that it was "folly."

Much surprise was occasioned by Sir Archibald Alison, in his "History of Europe,' including among the persons present at the funeral of the Duke of Wellington the name of "Sir Peregrine Pickle.' There can be little doubt that the author had made an unconscious slip, intending to name Sir Peregrine Acton. Sir Thomas Brassey having referred in a speech to the "Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics," the compositor transformed the title into the 'Golden Treasury of Soups and Cynics." A report in a Manchester paper of a recent dramatic performance mentioned the well known farce of "No, I Round the Corner" under the amusing and suggestive title of "No one Round the Corner."

In the following instance it was no doubt a bachelor compositor who, in setting up the toast, "Woman, without her, man would be a savage!" got the comma in the wrong place, and made the sentence read, "Woman, without her man, would be a savage!"

The deplorable state of the press in Field's time may be realized from the fact that Bishop Usher, on his way to preach a Paul's Cross, asked at a stationer's for a copy of the Bible, and on examining it found to his astonishment that the text from which he was about to preach was not in the book! The well-known "Vinegar Bible was published in 1717, and obtains its name from the Parable of the Vineyard being printed as the Parable of the Vinegar. One of the most wilful alterations of the text, and one which cost its perpetrator her life, was committed by the widow of a German printer. One night while an edition of the Bible was being printed in her house she took the opportunity of altering the word Herr into "Narr," making the verse read, "he shall be thy fool," instead of "he shall be thy lord."

A Glasgow divine, and one of her Majesty's chaplains in Scotland, was lately reported as saying that "personally he violated the Lord's Day as much as any member of the Court." "Venerated" was probably the word actually employed by the reverend gentleman.—[Chamber's Journal.

Boiling Mud-Pools in New Zealand.

The Maoris, with a faith born of long experience, bring their sorely tried rheumatic friends from far and near; and well are their pains rewarded, for many who have been crippled for years are here restored to comparative comfort and health. We saw one poor lad who literally lived in a mud-pool, just like one of the African mudfishes. He was suffering from an agonizing hip disease, and his friends had carried him from afar to try this blessed remedy. He certainly obtained great relief from lying in the muddy water for hours, but, in his weakly state, he very naturally fainted on being removed, so his kindred thought the best thing they could do was to build a hut over the pool, and keep him in it permanently. So there he has been for months and would probably remain there until he died.

Some of the boiling mud-pools are horribly repulsive. They lie in great natural pits or craters, and as you stand on the brink watching the surface of black boiling mud slowly upheave, with a dull gurgle, and then burst in the form of a monstrous bubble, you can scarcely repress a shudder at the thought of how one slip of the foot on that greasy soil might plunge you headlong into that horrible pool, therein to be hopelesly engulfed. The very silence with which it works is an element of horror, contrasting with the noise and energy of the clear boiling lakes, and the roar of the steam clouds as they escape from a thousand fissures in the rocks and from chasms all over the mountain-sides.

There is, however, one mud-lake in which interest predominates over horror. It is an expanse of halt-liquid gray mud, from the surface of which rise a multitude of small mud volcanoes—really miniatures, not more than three or four feet in height, but each a perfect model of an ideal conical crater, like Vesuvius or any other volcano of graceful outline. From each little summet come puffs of white steam, and then a small eruption of boiling clay, which, trickling down the surface, gradually builds up the tiny mountain.

The Maoris not only absorb this chemical mud externally, but they take large quantities internally. There are several places where a thick dark mud exudes from fissures in the rock, and this they have discovered to be edible, and eat large handsful with the greatest appreciation. One boiling mud-hole is known as the porridge pot in consequence of this peculiarity, and the natives who visit it swallow enough to satisfy an ordinary appetite.

What with mud-pools and mud volcanoes, and one large volcano of pure sulphur, and columns of steam rising on every side from the well-baked hills, and from the surface of the lake—what with many colored boiling pools, and the silvery whiteness of snowy terraces, Roto Mahana is, in truth, such a centre of marvels as seem to belong to some creation other than the steady-going world on whose solid surface we live our commonplace lives.

The sulphur volcano rises from the brink of the lake, very near the so-called "Pink Terraces," which, in point of fact, are distinguished from the "White Terraces" by a most delicate tinge of pale salmon color, like reflected sunlight on snow. The sulphur volcano produces a most startling effect of coloring in contrast with the vivid blue of sky and lake. It is entirely yellow—just the color of a bright primrose—and the great column of steam ascending from it is primrose-hued, and all the water near it is thus tinted, while the peaks far and near are coated with a deposit of pure sulphur.—[Cornhill Magazine.

Silent Suffering.

Silent suffering is a thing often unknown to the world; for there is much pain that is quite noiseless and vibrations that make human agonies are often mere whispers in the roar of hurrying existence. There are glances of hatred that stab and raise no cry of murder; robberies that leave man and woman forever beggared of peace and joy, but that are kept secret by the sufferer—committed to no sounds, except of low moans in the night—seen in no writing except that made on the face by the slow months of suppressed anguish and early morning tears. Many an inherited sorrow that has marred a life has been breathed into no human ear.

Three of Them Fresh.

Gilhooly and Gus De Smith entered an Austin restaurant, and sat down at a table.

"What will you have, gentlemen?" asked the obsequious waiter.

"I'll take three boiled eggs," said Gus.

"And you, sir?"

"I'll take the same, but be sure and have mine fresh," said Gilhooly.

The waiter goes to the speaking tube and calls out:

"Six boiled eggs, three of them have got to be fresh."

Our Infirmities.

It is often easier to bear with the infirmities of strangers than those of friends and kindred. Too often the sharpest words which we utter—those which sting the most keenly and cause the most bitter repentance—are addressed to those whom we love best. The sad fact ought to be appreciated, however, so that every one of us may be on his guard. In nothing is the spirit of Christ seen more plainly than in the little acts and unstudied words of home life, and no other victory over self is greater than when we bring ourselves; to neither speak nor make retort to the unkind words which so often spring to the lip in the domestic circle.

NIAGARA FALLS.

A New Theory Regarding Their Origin—Pre-Glacial Times.

Dr. Julius Pahlman, a local geologist of Niagara Falls, gives a correspondent of the Buffalo Courier the following theory of how the present cataract came into existence: "In tracing the origin of this river," he said, "we must go away back into the pre-glacial times, when the bed of the great lakes was occupied by a great river, and Tonawanda valley contained a lake 50 miles in length and 16 to 12 miles in width, with a possible maximum depth of 60 feet. The northern barrier of the lake was of limestone formation. Being about 50 feet lower than the southern one, the overflow of water was towards the Ontario valley. The outlet found its way into the present channel of the Niagara river somewhere near the upper rapids of the river above the falls. From here the waters met no obstacle, and in their flow predetermined the river gorge between the falls and the whirlpool, and continued in a straight course north through the side of the whirlpool, and thence through the valley of St. David's in Canada, and onward through the Ontario valley.

"I have made careful searches and find this track of the river from the whirlpool through Canada. By and by the Tonawanda lake began to subside, and finally was reduced to a river, with a wide, low valley on each side. The course of the river in making its way out of the valley of the ancient lake changed. It flowed into the channel of the present Niagara where the present Tonawanda river enters now. It curved around the southern margin of Grand Island—which formed a shallow part of the northern margin of the lake and had risen as a peninsula in the course of time—and then flowed north into the original channel of the outlet, thus determining the two branches of the present river. That branch of the Niagara river which separates the island from the mainland is of quite modern origin, as testified to by soundings. Well, the erosion across the thin bed of Niagara limestone naturally cut one or the other part of the outlet deeper than the rest, and confining the smaller channels gave birth to a number of larger and smaller islands, known at present as Goat, Bath, Luna, the Sisters, and so forth.

"The branches of the river joined again into one stream as they approached the heavy Niagara limestone at about the site of the new suspension or foot bridge, and rushed north for about three-quarters of a mile, where they fell over a precipice of about 100 feet. Goat island extended northerly in a triangular prolongation, with its apex somewhere abreast of the northern end of the present American fall. Below this fall of 100 feet, that I have just spoken of, the river descended in rapids over shale until it encountered the Clinton limestone near the railway suspension bridge, where it took another leap. From here a short rapid carried it to the entrance of the whirlpool, where another fall was caused by quartzose andstone of the Medina group. Thence there was a rapid current to Ontario basin. The volume of water then was exceedingly small as compared with the estimated 20,000,000 cubic feet a minute of the present. Now, at the time of the glacial period the movement of the ice sheet was in a north-easterly direction.

"The channel of the great river which I remarked about in the beginning was excavated deeply, and the valley of the great lakes was formed. When the Arctic climate again changed into a temperate one, the ice sheet retreated northward, and in its melting spread over the land all the ground up material as well as the rocks which had been caught up and carried under, and the valleys of St. David's, Tonawanda, and others more or less completely filled up with drift. The channel of the old Tonawanda river from the whirlpool was also included in the filling process. After long ages the ice disappeared, and the bed it had occupied became the seat of a chain of great lakes. At this time Lakes Erie and Ontario formed two large bodies of water, and were at the same, level, that is, their surfaces were even with Lewiston heights. The waters in the lakes began to subside, and a mud flat appeared between them, extending from Buffalo to Lewiston. An outlet from Lake Erie was formed through this flat, and we have the present Niagara river."

A Pacific Coast Curiosity

George W. Fox was over on the coast a few days ago, and has brought back with him quite a curiosity in the shape of a fragment of an abalone shell with an infant's foot, shoe and all, incased in abalone in the interior of the shell. The shape is perfect, and indicates a very young child. The sole of the shoe is seen; the toe is worn, and particles of the stockings may be picked out with a pin or needle. The buttons are covered with abalone, and the button hole where one of the buttons is pulled off is seen; also the little tassel at the ankle. The body of a drowned infant must have been carried along by the tide and the foot passed into the open shell of the shell fish, which was closed down and the imprisoned foot held until it was severed from the body by decay; in the meantime the fish covered the shoe by its secretions. The ankle shows the decay and the rotting off of the member, and was not covered over with the shell. It is reported that a woman and her child were drowned off the coast about seven years ago, and it is supposed that the foot is that of the child.—[Redwood City (Cal.) Gazette.

A Springfield oysterman has a featherless chicken. It is 3 months old. It is said that the chicken, although so young, can't be downed.

THE CROPS.

Report of the Bureau of Industries for November.

GREATER ABUNDANCE THAN ANTICIPATED.

The report of the Bureau of Industries for November deals chiefly with the grain and root crops of the Province, and gives tables of produce based on 1,350 returns made to the Bureau on the 25th of October. These tables show that the harvest of grain crops has been even more bountiful than appeared by the estimates of the 1st of August, and form a gratifying contrast to the tables of last year's harvest. The quality of the grain, too, is generally excellent, being plump, hard, and heavy. Barley, however, was badly discoloured by the rains of the harvest season, and the bulk of it does not rank higher than second grade. Wheat is remarkably free from defects of any kind. The grain is above the standard weight, and the average yield of spring and fall varieties is 22.3 bushels per acre, or 9.9 more than last year. Oats also show a large yield, although in the northern and northwestern counties this and other spring grains suffered from the drought of June and July. The total yield of peas is 18,691,607, bushels, or 3,000,000 more than last year. The quality is of unvarying excellence, little or no damage having been done by the bug. Beans and corn, which were in an unpromising condition at the end of July, made a surprisingly good recovery in August, and steadily improved to maturity. The yield of the former is 592,044 bushels and of the latter 12,935,889 bushels, being an average of 23.8 and 74 bushels per acre respectively. Last year both crops were destroyed by the frosts.

ROOT CROPS.

The root crop is generally an excellent one, especially potatoes, mangolds, and carrots. Turnips suffered to some extent from the August drought, but they are of good quality. The aggregate and average yield for 1883 and 1884 are as follows :—

		Aggregate		Average
		1884.	1883.	1884	1883.
Potat'e bush.		27,546,261	16,400,783	168.2	98.0

Carrots "		4,197,200	8,984,490	882.0	354.0
Turnips "		44,406,363	20,879,354	426.2	304.0

Spring do "		14,609,661	9,726,063	20.2	16.1
Barley "		19,119,041	18,414,337	27.3	24.1
Oats "		57,835,025	54,578,609	38 9	38 5

The clover midge has been very destructive on all fields from which a first crop of clover was taker, but where fields were pastured until the beginning or middle of June the seed was unharmed.

Fruit trees have been in a healthy condition, and have made a healthy growth of new wood, but with the exception of apples the crop of the season has been less than an average. Apples are plentiful and of good quality.

The area of fall wheat sown this year appears to be somewhat less than last year, but the land at seed here was in a much better state of tilth, and the young wheat has made a vigorous growth.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

From the number of attempts of assault and robbery within the last few weeks upon travellers at night, it would seem as if a gang of thieves were prowling the country, especially the eastern section of this township. Already several thefts have been reported. It would be well such high-handed work were stopped and the perpetrators brought to justice. On last Thursday night one of these attempts to rob was made upon the person of Mr. James M. Campbell, blacksmith, of the 4th line, Artemesia, while returning home from Eugenia. While passing through a rather secluded spot in the neighborhood of a small swamp, he was sprang upon by two men who emerged from the swamp and who jerked him from the vehicle on which he was seated. Mr. Campbell succeeded in felling one of his opponents with the heavy end of his whip-stock; the other struck at him several times with a knife, inflicting several cuts in his arm. Mr. Campbell, by his agility, caused his opponent No. 2 to retreat, when he sprang to his vehicle which luckily stood near by, as fortunately his horse stopped when he was first molested. Giving tongue to the animal he sprang forward and soon had his driver out of reach of the assassin.

Rev. Mr. McGregor and family move from our village this week to their new home in Victoria, Mr. McGregor having received a call from the church in that place; but as one drops out another steps in. Again we have the pleasant countenance of Dr. Carter in our midst who, by his contented looks, almost prevent the people from getting sick.

A good time is anticipated at the anniversary services of the Methodist church here next Sabbath. Dr. Harper of Collingwood is to preach morning and evening; and, Mr. Editor, if you don't come down to get some of the good things provided by the ladies on the Monday evening following (and fetch your goose-quill with you), we will try to give you a report of some of the doings of that evening.

Osprey.

From a corrpesondent.

Fine weather recently.

Fall plowing is well advanced.

Messrs. A. Heron and S. Osborn are preparing to erect a steam saw-mill on lot 1, con. 10.

FEVERSHAM.

After extensive repairs, the Feversham mills are running again. Mr. W. Perigo has been engaged as miller.

Mr. John Paul has engaged Charles Little to run his new blacksmith shop which was opened this week.

Mr. R. Brown is also about to have a wagon-maker.

R. T. McGirr has completed a fine stone cellar under his hotel.

Threshing is about wound up for the season, and the yield as well as quality is above an average.

Killed By A Tree.

DEATH OF A PIONEER.

From the Collingwood Enterprise.

On Wednesday Nov. 5, Alexander Tegart, of Singhampton, was engaged falling trees for C. Meckle, near Rosseau. A falling limb struck him and he immediately became unconscious and never recovered. A doctor was brought from Parry Sound, a distance of twenty miles, but could not help the dying man, who on Thursday was taken on board the steamer Nipissing for Gravenhurst, and died shortly after starting. His son Arthur was with him, and the greatest kindness was shown young Tegart by Mr. Meckle and the men in his employ.

The deceased was brought to Singhampton where a funeral service was held in the Methodist church on Sunday, and he was taken on Monday, the 11th, by the 5:40 train to Tottenham, for interment in the family burial ground. He was nearly sixty-five years of age, and able to do the average man's work. He leaves a wife and twelve children, the eldest son, Robert, having for years been Deputy-Reeve of Essa.

Mr. Tegart was a pioneer of Nottawasaga from about the year 1851, and was deputy-reeve and councillor for years. He was a member of the Methodist church, in fact the founder of it in his neighborhood, and he raised the body of a church on his farm thirty years ago. His house was then the meeting house, and the home of many of the early ministers of his church. He possessed great kindness of heart, often excessive, and lived to find that many of his acts of kindness were poorly requited.—Cox.

How Mr. Mackenzie's health is

Hon. Alex. Mackenzie has returned from New York after having consulted a noted physician there. It is to be regretted that the reports are far from favorable. His complaint is said to be what is commonly known as creeping paralysis.

Curious Deformity.

Chatsworth, Nov. 18.—This village perhaps possesses the most peculiar case of deformed humanity ever produced in Canada. The other evening Mrs. Elliot, wife of the druggist here, gave birth to a child, a strong and healthy infant. The little one is perfectly developed except in one particular. The right arm is entirely missing, with the exception that at the shoulder the knuckles of a hand are plainly discernible. The matter excites a great deal of attention.—News.

A copy should be seen in every farmers and housekeepers house.

BEAVER DAM.—On the rear of Mr. B. Coleman's farm, which adjoins the village; the Saugeen river crosses, and a new dam is being built by the industrious beaver. several of our citizens have, at various times recently, visited the place to see the wonderful works of the "emblem of industry." We were informed this week that a Markdale youth, in order to investigate more minutely the structure, went under water on Sunday last, but his explorations were not sufficiently interesting to report.

IN ONE SHORT YEAR!

Mrs. Blake did not faint. She did not even revile her future daughter-in-law. Percival's manner told her that words to this effect would be wasted. But she entreated her son, by every claim she had upon him, to do nothing hurriedly. Of course she objected to his desire; but she knew her objections would have no influence upon a man so madly in love. But she prayed for delay—literally went upon her knees and besought him not to be married for twelve months. A clever woman was Mrs. Blake. Who knew what unforseen things might happen in a year?

Percival yielded to some extent. After all before he married he must prepare another home for his mother and sisters. He wished to refurnish the rectory. He wished to be married without undue haste. He wished to see his people friendly with Philippa, and he wished Philappa to get some idea of what a clergyman's wife should be. So he agreed to wait six months—even, when worn out by his mother's tearful importunities, extended this time of probation till the end of the present year. In exchange, he stipulated that Mrs. Blake should try and bring herself to regard Philippa as a daughter.

He told Philippa what he had promised. She said nothing, but something in her look made him regret he had made the promise. However, he vowed that the first of January should be his wedding-day.

Mrs. Blake kept, at any rate, the letter of her contract with her son. The intercourse between the rectory and the Hollies seemed so friendly, that it looked as if the rector's mother was going to make the best of what she thought a bad job. Yet her presentiment was always with her. Although it was placed beyond doubt that Mrs. Russell had a considerable fortune, Mrs. Blake kept her presentiment, and prayed every night that Percival might escape from this siren. To do her justice, she was not anxious that he should marry money, so Mrs. Russell's fortune did not affect her views. Mrs. Blake played her part very well, and Percival was delighted when she suggested that Philippa should accompany her daughters and herself to London, whither they always went early in June; for Mrs. Blake, although but a country rector's widow, was a woman of fashion and friends.

It is very possible that whilst pressing this invitation on Philippa Mrs. Blake thought: "She has lived in London. A woman of her extraordinary appearance cannot be forgotten. Some one must surely know all about her."

Although Percival begged her to go with his mother, Philippa hesitated.

"Have you forgotten?" she whispered.

He frowned.

"It is better to face what may be in store than to fly it. Nothing can part us."

"Very well, I will go."

She kissed him and for the thousandth time told him how much she loved him.

A fortnight afterward Mrs Blake and Philippa were seated side by side at an evening party. The beautiful young widow was the object of much attention. Suddenly Mrs. Blake noticed that her companion stopped short in the middle of a sentence, and begged a gentleman near her to lead her from the room—the heat was overcoming her. Then Mrs. Blake felt sure that something had occurred, and looking round in search of it, saw a man leaning against the opposite wall and eying Philippa with amused wonder.

She knew him well—a rising barrister, with whose family she had long been upon terms of intimacy. So when he turned his eyes from the vanishing Philippa to her vacant chair, Mrs Blake signed him to fill it.

She cut greetings and inquiries very short.

"You know that lady who just left my side?" she said.

"I thought so. Perhaps I was mistaken. Tell me her name."

She told him.

"It must be the same," he said.

"What do you know of her?" asked Mrs. Blake.

"The law has its secrets as well as the church," said the barrister laughing.

"Don't jest, Richard Graham. I have known you and your family for years, and I ask you to tell me who and what Mrs. Russell is."

Graham glanced at her, and saw she was in terrible earnest. He hesitated, then said:

"I met her professionally. I was her counsel in a—an action."

Mrs Blake noticed the pause.

"A criminal action?" she asked sharply.

"Well—yes, it was."

"Was she acquitted?"

"No; but I believe she was innocent. I believe it firmly. The jury were fools."

And this woman about to marry the Rector of Chelston! No wonder Mrs. Blake's agitation was great enough to puzzle the barrister.

"Speak low," she said. "What had she done?"

"Her husband—a fearful rogue—was tried for forging and swindling. The rascal tried to save himself at her expense. She was tried with him. The man was sent to penal servitude for five years."

"Yes, yes—but the woman?"

"It was a burning shame," said Graham "On my soul, I believe she was innocent. The judge thought so too."

"Go on quickly," said Mrs. Blake.

"Her sentence was three months," said Graham reluctantly and sullenly. He hated himself for having tattled about this beautiful woman's antecedents.

"Then," said Mrs Blake, with emphatic pauses, "she has—actually been—in prison?"

"I suppose so. But why do you want to know? I wish I had said nothing."

"I have a right to know all about her," said Mrs. Blake icily. "For the sake of sealing your lips, I may tell you that Percival intended marrying her. What an escape! In prison! What an escape!"

She sailed away in search of her daughters and Philippa. Her head was in a whirl. The Rector of Chelston about to make a creature who had worked on the treadmill and picked oakum his wife! Her presentiment had come true with a vengeance. She walked from room to room in search of her charges, and mechanically murmured: "What an escape! What an escape!"

Mrs. Russell was willing enough to go home. Mrs. Blake's lip curled as she thought why. She said nothing, but before going to bed telegraphed to her son, bidding him come at once.

He came up by the first train the next morning. Mrs. Blake had managed to get Philippa and her daughters out of the way, so was able to meet him alone. His first inquiry was for Philippa. He seemed greatly relieved by hearing she was well.

Then Mrs. Blake made her communication. She was kind enough to suppress all show of triumph; but she told him everything, and wondered at the silence with which he heard it.

"Oh, Percival, my son," she cried, "what an escape!"

He looked fearfully stern.

"I hoped you would be spared this," he said. "I hoped it might remain unknown to all save Philippa and myself."

"Percival! What are you saying?"

"I knew it before she promised to be my wife. She told me herself. Poor girl, she was cruelly wronged. Her life has been a hard one, Till her wretched husband died in prison it was misery."

"She deceived you—cajoled you! Percival You cannot mean to—"

"This will make no change in my plans. I shall be married on the first of January."

Mrs. Blake really did succumb at the announcement. She fell, a dead heap, into a chair.

"Graham I shall see at once," continued her son, "and entreat his silence. But even if the matter becomes public property it may be lived down."

Mrs. Blake was goaded past endurance. She rose in fierce wrath.

"Besotted boy!" she cried, "You—in your position—Rector of Chelston—to marry a convict, a felon! Percival, I am ashamed of you—ashamed! I will go to the bishop—to Lord Keynsham. It shall never be!"

In his present mood the names of the bishop and Lord Keynsham were to Percival no more than sounding brass.

"I am sorry, very sorry, mother," he said; "but I love Philippa too well to give her up; and surely, if one person above another should exercise Christian charity, it is a clergyman."

"Christian charity!" said Mrs. Blake with biting scorn. "Call it by its true name—blind, unholy passion!"

She left him, little knowing how deeply her parting shaft had struck.

He saw Graham; then returned and told Philippa everything. She listened with composure,

"I expected it," she said, "the past can never be obliterated." Then she added, "I do not even offer to free you. You are mine—mine for ever."

The look which accompanied her words added another link to the chain which already bound him.

It was impossible she should remain longer with Mrs. Blake. That afternoon, accompanied by the rector, she went back to Chelston. Percival, who considered that he was absolved from his promise to his mother suggested an early day for the marriage.

"No, no," said Philippa. "Why change our plans? I have no fear of losing your love. No one shall say I have hurried you into marriage."

Mrs. Blake's hopes revived when, in reply to a long, reproachful letter, her son informed her that the previous arrangement would be adhered to. There was still six months' grace, so Mrs. Blake did not curtail her visit to town. She even went to the seaside for a few weeks as usual. Whilst "that creature" was within stone's throw, the Rectory was not an attractive residence.

At last she returned home, and it soon became an open secret that there was friction between the ladies of the Rectory and the lady of the Hollies, but signs soon multiplied which told the Chelston folk that the rector meant to have his own way.

In the late autumn a house was taken in the neighborhood, and it was perfectly well known this was to be Mrs. Blake's house after the marriage. Whispers went round that Mrs. Russell had ordered and extensive trousseau from London. But all doubt was disposed of when the banns were called in Chelston Church. Then Mrs. Blake's heart really sunk. She had kept, and would keep her own counsel. The world need not see the Rectory soiled linen But after this public announcement, which she called an insult to God and man, she had another stormy scene with her "besotted boy." He was more determined than ever to go his own way, so she washed her hands of him altogether. Perhaps she was not to blame, Although he saw Phillippa frequently, the days passed slowly with the rector, and he longed for the moment which for better or worse, would make Philippa his wife. In his secret heart he blamed himself for the boundless sway this woman exercised over him—even the strength of her love startled him. When they were married all would doubtless be well. In time his mother and sisters might come round. Surely, with his strong mind, he could make the woman who adored him a perfect parson's wife. In spite of everything they would be happy; yet, as he told himself so, he knew that had the blackest misery been shown to be his lot, he must still have married Philippa.

The last day of the old year dawned, and Percival Blake rejoiced to think that to morrow would end his uncertainties and troubles. He was now alone in the Rectory. Mrs. Blake, having sternly refused to attend the ceremony, or to permit her daughters to be present, had by her son's advice if not command, left the neighborhood for a while.

Although he had been very busy all the day he had seen Philippa once or twice, and had promised to call again after the evening service. He preached his sermon, introducing a few fitting words about to morrow's event; then having lingered in the vestry giving some last instructions to his subordinates, he started to walk across to the Hollies.

In going from the church to the Hollies, about two hundred yards were saved by turning out of the main road and passing through the meadows which ran by Chelston stream. Although this route took one to the back of the house, he usually chose it, Philippa having given him a key which opened the garden gate. He went this way now.

It was a clear starlight night. The ground was turned into iron by a sharp frost. As the rector walked briskly along the river path, he thought of all that had occurred since this time last year, when he bore Philippa into the vestry. Not now did he wish this year taken out of his life. But he prayed that before the next year was over many things which now distressed him might be made right. It was a terrible thing to quarrel with mother and sisters, but then it had been for Philippa's sake. Heavens! how he loved that woman!

He turned from the river path and struck across the field toward the Hollies. He had scarcely gone twenty yards when he heard a sharp scream; and looking round, he saw to his right some distance up the river bank. two dark struggling forms. As he ran toward them he saw that the combatants were a man and a woman, but he was almost within arm's length before he realized the truth—that the woman, who appeared to be defending herself from some ruffian's murderous attack, was Philippa.

Percival Blake was a man of immense muscular power. At Oxford he had been famous as an athlete. Without a word he set his teeth and sprung on Philippa's assailant. He dared not strike him—his crushing blow might fall on the wrong person—but in a second the wretch found his arms wrenched from his victim and half dislocated, whilst he writhed helplessly in the enraged clergyman's grip.

That ineradicable old Adam, revenge, lurks in every heart, lay or clerical. Whether it is aroused or not is but a question of the stimulating motive. Surely a man in the rector's situation may be pardoned for inflicting summary punishment. He did not stop to argue the moral points of the case. His blood boiled in a most unchristianlike manner. Without more ado, he put forth all his great strength and hurled the ruffian from him with prodigious force. The man fell with a dull heavy thud on the iron bound path: moreover, he lay there still and silent; and Percival, whose rage was expended in that effort of strength, felt his heart grow sick from the fear that he had taken human life.

Yet Philippa was his first care. She stood by his side motionless. He face in the moonlight, looked livid. Her eyes were dilated and full of horror. She paid no heed to his anxious enquiries, but she clasped her hands round his strong right arm—she even seemed to caress it, to be trying to estimate its power.

"Percival," she whispered, "you are strong—you have killed him."

"God forbid!" said Percival nervously, and stepping to the fallen man. His fears were soon at rest. The fellow breathed heavily and as he leaned over him the rector detected in that breath a strong smell of ardent spirits. He was glad to find the man a stranger to Chelston—glad he had not been compelled to chastise one of his own flock. Evidently the rogue was a half-drunken tramp; so, greatly relieved, the rector went back to Philippa.

"He is dead—you have killed him?" she said.

"No—senseless, and, I suspect, half-drunk. Now go home. I will run up to the village and fetch the constable."

Philippa shivered.

"Go back and kill him?" she said in a strange voice.

The rector looked at her in amazement. Her large eyes gleamed like those of a wild animal.

"My darling," he said, "you are upset. If he has robbed you or injured you he will pay bitterly for it. Go home, dear Philippa, I will soon be with you."

Again he felt her shudder. Then all at once her calmness and presence of mind seemed to return.

"I was upset," she said. "I don't know what I said. Percival, we cannot leave the poor wretch lying there."

The rector was thinking the same thing.

"Besides," she continued, "I am only frightened, not hurt. If you send for the police we shall have to give evidence."

She spoke wisely. To-morrow they were to start for sunnier lands. Was it worth while delaying their departure for the sake of giving this drunken wretch a taste of the treadmill?"

"I will hear his account of himself," said Percival sternly. "Wake up!" he continued shaking the tramp's shoulder. All the waking up he seemed capable of was limited to an uneasy grunt.

"Carry him up to the house—it is not far" suggested Philippa. "Leave him in one of the outhouses until he recovers."

The rector could discover no better plan. He threw his fallen foe, who proved to be a slight attenuated creature, over his shoulder and bore him to the Hollies. By Phillipa's directions he placed him on the floor of the tool-house. There was no lock to the door, but as the man gave no evidence of an immediate return to consciousness that mattered little.

"We must try and revive him," said Percival rather nervously.

"Come indoors, I will get something."

He followed her through the French casement of the drawing room. He was beginning to wonder what had taken her abroad that night, and intended to lecture her on her rashness; but as soon as they entered the room she left him, to fetch the remedies, he concluded.

More than ten minutes passed before she returned. The rector grew uneasy and fidgety. He did not like to think of that senseless tramp outside. He blamed himself for the vengeful force he had put into his arms. A horrible thing, indeed, if he, a clergyman, had caused a man's death! Where was Philippa? He would wait for her no longer. At that moment the door opened, and his bride entered.

Was she mad? Why at this particular moment did she come to him like this? Brief as her absence had been she had found time to make what can only be called a grand toilet. She wore the richest of the many rich dresses which had just been sent from London. There were diamonds in her ears; diamonds on her white uncovered neck. Her beautiful long round arms were bare, or but partially veiled by thin, delicate lace, and a blood red flower burned in her black hair. A queen! No queen with charms to compare with Philippa's has yet graced a throne! So, with her maddening beauty brightened by all that art can do, she entered the room, and after laying on the table what seemed to be a small bundle of some kind, with a firm quick step she came toward her lover.

A cry of astonishment, of delight, sprung from him. She placed her soft white fingers on his lips, drew him to a low chair, and motioned him to be seated.

He obeyed. She knelt beside him, her face on a level with his own. A strange sweet perfume emanated from her garments. She wreathed her warm white arms around his neck. She kissed him on his brow, his eyes, his mouth. She drew her face a little away from his, and her dark lustrous eyes gazed into his with wild rapture. He forgot everything save the glorious being who knelt beside him—all save his love for her, her love for him.

He returned her caresses with passion. Her magnificent bosom rose and fell with her quick breathing. His cheek brushed her satiny shoulder. He was in a dream of intoxicating bliss—and yet faintly through it he seemed to hear his mother's words, "blind, unholy passion!"

"Percival, Percival!" murmured the woman. "You love me!" His answer was not given in words.

"I am worth loving," she whispered. "Such love is worth a sacrifice. Percival, it is worth more. It is worth a crime!"

Even then he returned her embrace.

"Percival, listen. Love, kiss me and listen. That man outside—he is my felon husband."

A sharp fierce cry broke from him. His very lips turned ashen. Yet still he held her to him.

"They told me he was dead—yet he lives. No matter. Shall our love be wrecked by him?"

A cold sweat broke out all over the man. Yet he turned not from her kiss.

"Dearest," she went on in her flute-like voice. "How shall it be. Shall we fly like cowards to another land? I am rich, you know."

He shivered from head to foot. Some strange instinct made him turn his eyes to the little bundle she had placed on the table. The woman followed his gaze.

"No," she said, with a low, wild laugh. "No need to fly. Percival, I would have done it alone, but I knew we should love the better if we sinned together. Come."

Still holding his hand, she rose. Percival Blake staggered to his feet. He swayed to and fro like a drunken man, and grasped the table for support. The woman smiled in his face.

"I am worth it," she whispered, as she unwound a large handkerchief and disclosed a stoppered bottle.

"It will be painless," she murmured. "It will be like going to sleep. Come, dearest."

She placed the handkerchief and the bottle in one of his nerveless hands; the other she took in her own. She led him, as one leads a blind man, to the casement. She opened it and the keen fresh wintry air cut into the perfumed atmosphere of the room like a knife.

On the threshold she paused and clung to him in an almost frenzied embrace. The man quivered beneath it. Then, hand in hand, they walked down the garden path. They went swiftly, although the man moved as one in a trance.

She led him to the door of the outhouse. It was open. She looked into his set drawn face. Her burning fingers tightened round his icy-cold hand.

"Your hand trembles, sweet love," she said, and therewith took the handkerchief and the bottle from him.

She passed in, and whilst he stood as one spell bound, leaning for support against the doorpost, she began feeling about for the recumbent figure of her husband.

In a minute she was at her lover's side again. She shook his arm fiercely.

"Gone! He has gone!" she cried. "Seek him! He cannot be far off!"

Her words, her touch, seemed to break the spell. With a low cry Percival Blake fell upon his knees, and lifting up his hands, thanked God, whose mercy had willed that he should not be a murderer in very deed as well as in thought. Then the humbled man bowed his head, and sob after sob broke forth.

The woman stood like a statue. A dreary look of hopeless despair settled on her pallid face. Not a muscle moved—not even when Percival Blake rose to his feet and confronted her with eyes full of horror and aversion.

"Temptress! Fiend!" he whispered. "I have another prayer to make—that we may never meet again."

He turned away and went swiftly down the path to the gate by which he had entered. It was but a few steps away. Before he passed through it he cast one look back. Phillippa stood as he had left her, tall and erect; her white face, neck and arms gleaming in the wintry moonlight. Then, even then, the old fascination struggled for supremacy—all but mastered him. He took a backward step. Had she made but one sign he must have rushed to her side. But she moved neither hand nor foot. By a supreme effort he wrenched himself away, passed through the gate, closed it behind him, and rushed out into the night—anywhere! anywhere!

For two or three hours he wandered about aimlessly; then, scarcely knowing how, found himself in Chelston churchyard. He carried a key which opened the little door of the church. He entered the building and groped his way to the altar steps. He threw himself on the cold stones and lay there in contrition and abasement until five o'clock in the morning. Then, a humbled man, he crept to the rectory and from sheer exhaustion slept.

Terrified tearful faces met him when he arose. As gently as they could, people told him that an hour ago Mrs. Russell's old servant had found her mistress in her own room, lying on her own bed, dressed as one going to a ball, but quite cold and dead. In a horrified whisper they added it was feared she had committed suicide.

This is the story of that year in a man's life which must be swept away from his memory before he can call himself happy.

THE END.

The Czar of Russia's Winter Palace.

The Winter Palace is described as the largest palace in the world being one-third larger than that of the Emperor of Austria's, and unsurpassed in point of splendor. It is the residence of the Czar and his Court during winter, and stands on the left bank of the Neva. The palace is four stories high, or about 80 feet; the frontage is 455 feet in length, in breadth 350 feet. The principal entrance or "perron des Ambassadeurs," is from the Neva, and leads by a magnificent flight of marble steps to the state apartments of the palace. A gateway in the centre of the building, facing Alexander's Column, opens into a large court. The most magnificent apartments are the Throne Room of Peter I., where the diplomatic corps generally present their congratulations on New Year's Day; the White Hall, the Hall of St. George, a paralfelogram of 140 feet by 60 feet; the gallery of the Field-Marshals and the Alexander gallery, a suite of splendid halls, filled with marbles, malachites, vases, and pictures. When the Imperial family is in residence, about 6,000 persons are lodged in the building.

It is enough to take away your breath to hear of a California onion weighing nearly two pounds.

NEWSPAPER FABLES.

A $ Mark and a * were one day left close together on the Imposing Stone, and the $ Mark coughed in a Pompous way and observed:

"I am constantly used to designate the Wealth of the World."

"And I," replied the *, as he Bristled up in the Prompt est Manner, "am symbolic of Liberty."

"By means of me," continued the $ Mark "the Printer can change 1 000,000 Grains of Sand into $1 000,000."

"Yes, but Heaven's vaults are studded with Stars, and I am frequently used in Print to represent Unknown Quantities."

They were still Boasting when the Apprentice came up and Inquired the Cause of the Excitement. Having received an Explanation, he said:

"Both are of so little use that I'll chuck you into the pi case."

Ouida says: "A girl's love must never be begged but conquered." Paradoxical as it may seem, the girl cannot be conquered unless she concurs.

It is about time the papers let up on publishing that threadbare item about not stirring stewed mushrooms with a silver spoon. In the first place, this a close season for mushrooms, and, secondly, the stockbrokers haven't left us any silver spoons.

Lord Norbury, when once charging a jury in a breach of promise case, noticed that the letters of the faithless defendant had been so long in the plaintiff's pocket or so often shown to her sympathizing friends that they were greatly frayed at the folds and almost in tatters. "Gentlemen," said Lord Norbury, carefully holding up one of the epistles to the gaze of the jury, "it's easy to see that these are love letters, because they are so exceedingly tender."

Alaska Glaciers.

It was nearly sunset when we began to near the Muir glacier, and the day was near ended when the cliff was reached, and we had anchored near the frowning precipice. The shades of evening had gathered about the islands passed during the day and half hid from sight the lower ranges and the trackless forests; but the Fairweather peaks were visible still and glowed with a ghastly light in the isolated height like banks of phosphorous hung above the trees. Around us floated icy fragments, grinding against each other, or floating, solitary, and majestic down the watery way. The scene was grand past all conception, wild and beautiful, and silencing all with admiration. No other wonder of nature equals this glacier of untold age, as it moves silently yet irresistibly down from its birthplace to the sea, crying as it comes the very embodiment of strength, the destroyer of all life. All the glaciers of Switzerland might be combined and together they would not equal this of Glacier Bay. Set it crawling over the valleys guarded by Mont Blanc, and it would crush the country beneath its weight and leave a wilderness behind. And yet in Alaska, long and broad and wild, it is a mere fissure—a single stream among the many.—[San Francisco Chronicle.

Horrible Religious Exercises—Jews and Cholera—Liquor in Paris—A Courageous Act—Murder and Robbery, &c., &c.

In an article on the religious exaltations of the Orient, Dr. Zambaco describes the sect of Rafais, who in their religious ceremonies jump, dance, oscillate, and shriek for two hours at a time, or until they fall into convulsions. When the excitement is at its height their power of feeling physical pain appears to be lost, for they pierce their limbs and bodies with sharp knives, and often swallow broken glass, living scorpions, and cactus leaves armed with thorns.

Nantes, France, has had a Charley Ross case. A sweep decoyed away a boy of 9 and put him to climbing chimneys. One day this man and a comrade, when half drunk, stripped the child and whipped him with nettles. The boy managed to escape, and told his story to someone who communicated with his friends, and after a month's hue and cry, he is at home again, and his abductor in custody.

A very clever scamp, in prison at Poissy, France, has lately succeeded to large property in Switzerland, a fact which has been formerly announced to the jail authorities by the legal authorities at Zurich. The former are amused at the intense sense of property rights which the news has developed in the rogue, who is full of apprehensions, founded on his own experiences, lest thieves impair his possessions.

The Ravel Gazette gives an account of a preliminary investigation in which a girl, aged 8 years, was charged with having murdered a companion only 5 years old, by stabbing her with a knife, which penetrated the heart. The circumstances seemed to point to premeditation. The day before the elder girl wanted to obtain a piece of gay-colored cloth which the other refused to give up. The elder threatened to kill unless she surrendered it the next day. Next day accordingly she repeated her demand, and upon being again refused she instantly stabbed the girl.

The European Jewish papers comment on the remarkable exemption Jews have enjoyed from cholera. At Naples the number of victims has been very small, at Toulon none. Of seven at Marseilles five, writes Rabbi Weyle, did not live conformably with Hebrew precepts in the matter of food or hygiene, while of the other two, a father and son, the first, a victim to duty, died in the hospital, and the other fell a sacrifice to filial love by insisting on nursing his father. The percentage to population of Jews' deaths was 0 07 per 100; for other inhabitants, 0 33. The grand rabbi of Marseilles ascribes the exemption to Jewish hygeine and mode of life.

An interesting article in the Deutsche Grundeigenthum shows how extraordinarily railroads have increased the growth of inland capitals. In 1740 Berlin was already the capital of a powerful kingdom, but its situation was such that the farmer in bringing his goods to market over the bad roads consumed on their journey more than half their market value, and great difficulty was felt in provisioning a large population. When, in 1843, the influence of railroads first began to be felt, Berlin had 930 230 people: in 1861 547,000: in 1871, 800,000; in 1881, 1,122 300—an increase of nearly 800,000 in thirty-seven years. Madrid's growth is largely due to like causes.

The importance of the liquor traffic in Paris may be judged from the fact that more than $12,500,000 is annually raised there by octroi duties on alcoholic drinks alone, and the consumption per head of population is as much as forty-five gallons of wine, a gallon and a half of spirits, and three gallons of beer. That the consumer, in Paris at least, has much to put up with in bad wine appears from the municipal laboratory report. Taking the month of June last, 552 specimens of wine were officially tested; only 113 were good, 39 were bitter or acid, 53 had an unpleasant taste, 129 were plastered, 132 had water added, and lastly, 86 had various mixtures added to them.

Leo XIII. will create eight new cardinals at the secret consistory to be held on the 10th of November—one Austrian, Mgr. Gaugibauer, archbishop of Vienna; one Spaniard, Mgr Gonzalez Diaz Tuon, archbishop of Seville; and six Italians—namely: Mgr. Massaia, the venerable African missionary; Mgr. Merosi Gori, secretary of the consistorial congregation; Ngr. Laurenzi, assessor of the holy office; Mgr. Massotti, secretary of the congregation of bishops and regulars, and Mgr. Nerga, secretary of the congregation of the council there will remain seven vacancies in the sacred college, exclusive of one creation reserved in petto since the 13th of December 1880.

Vice Admiral Close, of the British navy, has offered a singular explanation about the loss of the gunboat Wasp recently, off the Irish coast. There exists, it seems, a form of defective sight known as "moon blindness," persons afflicted with which are unable to perceive a light shining in darkness. It is easy to see the consequences of this infirmity in the navigating officer of a ship. Admiral Close says he nearly lost the man-of-war Trident once from this cause, only discovering in the nick of time that his navigating officer was unable to see the light of a lighthouse half a mile distance. If "moon blindness" is an established fact in medical science, the sooner provision for detecting it is made the better.

The Ethnological museum at Berlin has been lately enriched by a fine collection of South American antiquities, which have been gathered during many years by Herr Mehring, a German resident in Brazil. The collection is almost wholy composed of objects which have been disinterred from burial mounds and simular places, and includes axes, arrow-heads, lance-heads, all of stone, and generally of most perfect workmanship; monumental stones, earthenware, utensils, and some painted pottery. There are two pipes, evidentlly used for smoking, made of baked clay, the bowls representing caricature faces. Besides these ancient objects, Herr Mehring has also presented to the museum a very numerous collection of modern utensils, weapons and ornaments obtained from South American Indians.

Naples has just lost her oldest painter in Tommaso de Niva, who has died at the age of 94. From early youth to advanced age he was active in his profession, and only two weeks before his death he gave the finishing touches to his last picture, the "Virgine Immaculate." The public buildings of Naples contain many of his works, and specimens of his art are to be seen in various parts of Italy and other European countries, as well as our own. He was a professor in the Institute of Fine Arts, inspector general of all the royal galleries, and member of the academies of the Pantheon and of St. Luca. He had received eleven gold medals from public exhibitions, and had been decorated with nine knightly honors. Yet despite has labors and fame he died poor. The syndic was requested by the government to assign a distinguished place in the cemetery for his remains among the "bene merite" of the country.

A Boulogne correspondent reports a courageous act in life-saving at Bazac-sur l'Isle, a village in the Derdogue department, France. Four little boys, two sets of brothers, of ages ranging from 11 down to 6 years, were crossing a bridge over the mill-sluice when one of the lads fell into the water which was at that part over ten feet deep. The eldest of the boys, without divesting himself of any clothing, jumped in to the rescue of his friend, and succeeded in bringing him to the bank. Their companions rushed to the spot to pull them out, but the matter was not easy, as the bank was about two feet high, and they ran the risk of being dragged in also. They were eventually landed safely by the boys on the bank lying down, so making a counterbalance to those in the water, who were considerably out of their depth.

Every now and then facts come to light, says The Pall Mall Gazette, which seems to conflict strangely with the theories of the doctors. For instance, at Howdon, a dirty, desolate village on Tyneside, a boy was born who, at the time of his birth, had four grandparents and five great-grandparent alive, each of whom was in active work, earning his or her own livlihood. Yet the village where these hale and hearty grandsires and granddames live and flourish is one of the most unsanitary in England. Open sewers run down the centre of some of the streets. Until a few years ago the water supply was from one shallow well. Only one solitary scavenger is employed on half time for cleansing, repairing, and mantaining all the streets. Houses have been condemned wholesale as unfit for human habitation, to the intense disgust of the people. Yet, notwithstanding all these adverse conditions, these families live and thrive vigourously.

A most determined murder and robbery was committed recently by five Italians at Nogent-sur-Marne, near Paris. The murderers broke into a wine-shop in the high street, and overpowered the garçon, who vainly endeavored to defend himself. He fell to the ground, bleeding profusely from numerous wounds in his chest, inflicted by the knives of the Italians. The proprietress of the establishment, an old woman named Guinisset, was aroused by the cries of the garçon, and came down from her room, when the murderers immediately attacked her, rifled her pockets, and left her half strangled on the floor. The Italians then broke open the cash-box of the shop, and succeeded in making their escape with 15,000 francs. Some passers-by, seeing the door open, went in, and finding Mme. Guinisset and the garçon almost lifeless, immediately informed the gendarmes. The garçon died in a few hours from the effects of his wounds, but the woman had sufficiently recovered to be able to make a statement to the police. The perpetrators of the murder and robbery have not been discovered.

A Dance of Death.

In spite of the occasional slaughter of 500,000 Chinese before breakfast by the French troops in Tonquin, according to the dispatches to the War Office, in Paris, it must be pretty dull for the reporters there. Even a reporter for a French paper gets tired merely of setting down every day a new figure with several rows of ciphers to represent the total of Chinese corpses.

Accordingly a Parisian paper tells a very thrilling story of a reporter attached to an "esteemed contemporary," who, with his comrades, signed a promise not to send any information by telegraph or mail, without submitting his manuscript to the commanding officer, on penalty of subjecting himself to martial law. After signing it he told the general commanding that in spite of his pledge he should tell the truth about everything which came under his observation. Thus warned, the General set spies on him, and in a few days the correspondent was detected posting a letter at a small town on the frontier. The letter was fished out and brought to the General, who sent for the correspondent. He admitted that the letter was his, but protested that the General would be violating the privacy of correspondence if he opened it. The General replied that it would have been public in Paris in less than twenty-four hours, and went on with his reading.

He became enraged as he found that it was a severe stricture upon the conduct of the campaign. On finishing it, he informed the correspondent, that inasmuch as he considered himself a competent military authority he should have a taste of martial law to add to his military knowledge.

A court-martial was convened. The trial was short. The sentence read: "Condemned to be shot at 6 next morning at the capital city." He was put upon a special train, which arrived there half an hour before the execution was to take place. A ball at the palace of the Governor-General was not yet ended, and he asked permission to have a waltz before he died." He was allowed to waltz even with the Governor-General's daughter, and when the time had expired he bade adieu, went out before the file of soldiers, gave the word and expired, also "May all journalists do as I have done; it is their duty," was his last words.

Thus it will be seen that it is easier to stay in Paris and write thrilling narratives of exciting scenes it Tonquin than it is to go there and stand like the entry-clerk of a Chicago pork house and count the number of victims slaughtered every day.

The Old Hundredth.

The music harmonized in four parts of this venerable church tune was composed by Claude Goudimel, about the year 1544. The composer, who was chapel master at Lyons, France, died in 1572, a victim to religious opinion. The harmony of this hymn has since been altered, as may be seen by comparing the same as arranged in the present collections of church music with the original. It is a popular musico-historical error that Luther was the composer of this chorael.

Oddities of Wills.

Among the curious wills and bequests that deserve mention is that of a French merchant who in 1610, left a large legacy to the lady who had jilted him, in order to express his gratitude to her for her forbearance and his admiration for her sagacity in leaving him to a happy bachelor life. Jasper Mayne, who died in 1620, left to a bibulous servant an old portmanteau which, he wrote, the legatee would value when he found that it contained something "which would enable him to drink." The "something" proved to be a red herring. A Scotch gentlemen having two young daughters bequeathed to each her weight, not in gold, but in £1 bank notes. The elder seems to have been slimmer than her sister, for she only got $256,000, while the younger received $287,720. An annuity of $250 was bequeathed to the bellringers of Bath Abbey by Lieu Col. Nash, "provided they should muffle the clappers of the bells of the said abbey, and ring them with doleful accentuation from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m. on each anniversary of his wedding day, and during the same number of hours, only with a merry peal, on the anniversary of the day which released him from domestic tyranny and wretchedness." Bequests of bodies for anatomical purposes, or of skulls as curiosities or relices have been sufficiently numerous; but unquestionably the most curious will of this sort was that made by Mr. S Sanborn in 1871, when the testator left his remains for dissection and provided that the flesh stripped from his bones should be used to fertilize an American elm, and his skin be converted into two drumheads, inscribed with the Declaration of Independence and Pope's Universal Prayer, on which "Yankee Doodle" should be played at Bunker Hill annually on the 17th of June.

A testator cannot it need scarcely be said be too careful in drawing up a will. "My black and white horses" do not bear the same meaning as "my black and my white horses." A near friend of Victor Cousin, the philosopher, lost a large legacy through a trifling accident and delay. Cousin intended to include his name in his will, but there was no stamped paper in the house, and he told his servant to obtain some. The servant said he would—tomorrow—and on the morrow Cousin died at dinner, just as a West of England millionaire was choked at breakfast with a fish bone with the unsigned will which would have altered the disposition of his vast estate lying on the table. People should immate the example of Lord Eldon, who, when a very rich piece of patronage came into his gift, having received the news while riding with the relative upon whom he intended to bestow it, wrote out the appointment while sitting in his saddle, lest he should be thrown from his horse before he got home. An officer in the Indian army, who had not much to leave, but was on friendly terms with two of his brother officers, made a will, leaving his property, consisting merely of personal belongings, to be divided between them. The testator came unexpectedly into a very large fortune, but he forgot all about his will and never made another. When he died the will made under such different circumstances held good, and his aged mother, sisters and near relations were left out in the cold.

Of bequests to animals a few may be mentioned. In 1781 a peasant of Toulouse made his horse his universal heir. Doctor Cristiano, of Venice, left 6,000 florins for the maintenance of his three dogs, with a condition that at their death the sum should be added to the University of Venice. A Mrs. Elizabeth Hunter, in 1813, left $1,000 a year for her parrot, and the Count of Mirandola bequeathed a considerable legacy to a pet carp Lord Chesterfield left a sum for the support of his favorite cat, as also did one Frederick Harper, who settled $500 a year on his "young black cat," the interest to be paid to his house keeper, Mrs. Hodges, as long as the cat should remain alive. The most singular of these wills, however, was that of a Mr. Herkeley, of Knightsbridge, who died in 1805. He left $125 to four of his dogs. During a journey through France and Italy this gentleman, being attacked by brigands, had been protected and saved by his dog; the four animals he pensioned by his will were the descendants of this faithful friend. Feeling his end near Mr. Berkeley desired that two arm chairs might be brought to his bedside and his four dogs seated on them, received their last caresses, which he returned with the best of his failing strength, and died in their paws. By an article in his will he ordered that the busts of his four dogs should be carved in stone and placed at the four corners of his tomb.—[Philadelphia Record.

Was It Fate or Fortune?

The following circumstance is as true as it is singular: A few years ago, two gentlemen, who had been left executors to the will of a friend, on examining the property, found a scrap of paper, on which was written, "Ten thousand dollars in Till." This they took in the literal sense, and examined all his apartments carefully, but in vain. They sold his collection of books to a bookseller, and paid the legacies in proportion. The singularity of the circumstance occasioned them frequently to talk about it, and they recollected among the books sold (which had taken place upwards of seven weeks before) there was a folio edition of Tillotson's Sermons. The probability of this being what was alluded to by the word "Till" on the piece of paper, made one of them immediately wait upon the bookseller who had purchased the books, and ask him if he had the edition of Tillotson, which had been among the books sold to him On his replying in the affirmative, and the volumes being handed down, the gentleman immediately purchased them, and on carefully examining the leaves, found bank bills singly dispersed in various parts of the volumes, to the amount of ten thousand dollars! But what is perhaps no less remarkable than the preceding, the bookseller informed him that a gentleman at Cambridge, Mass., read in his catalogue of this edition to be sold, had written to him, and desired it might be sent to Cambridge, which was accordingly done; but the books not answering the gentleman's expectations, they had been returned, and had been in the bookseller's store till the period of this very singular discovery.

In Morocco when a thief is caught in the most trivial offence, they politely request him to hold up both hands. Then they ask him what hand he would prefer to have in his possession, and when he has made his choice they cut off the other. When a thief has thus lost both hands, and also his foot, he loses his head and quits stealing.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

(From the Regina Leader.)

We visited the general store of Mr. G. L. Dodds, Wolseley, and found it a veritable "Noah's Ark" of things inanimate. He has a large and well assorted stock of all sorts of fall goods, hardware of every description, groceries, ad libitum, boots shoes and overalls and his stock of dry goods comprises some of the very finest articles that can be had in any store of our large cities. We were quite surprised at seeing such quality of gloves, silks and all sorts of wearing apparel. It is a dangerous place for a young man to go to with "his girl," the temptations in the ladies department are quite irresistable. Mr. Dodds buys his stock mostly from Montreal, and, as he does a business of about $40,000 a year, he can offord to buy in large quantities at such a rate as enables him to retail at reasonable prices.

Mr. Hiram Parker, section foreman at Wolseley, was united in the happy bonds of wedlock on Wednesday the 6th November, to Miss Mary Jane Kenny, also of Wolseley. The wedding was celebrated on Wednesday evening by the bride, bridegroom and their numerous friends, by a "grand hop" in the public hall, Wolseley, which was kept up with great glee till well on in the sma' hours, when the company dispersed, all highly pleased with their night's enjoyment, and with emphatic wishes for the future happiness of Mr. and Mrs. Parker.

Another wedding in Wolseley is expected in the course of a few days, and it is rumored that there are more to follow. Mr. G. L. Dodds keeps a large supply of marriage licenses on hand which he is ready to supply at all hours. He expects to have quite a "boom" in marriage licenses before the advent of the new year.

The country round Wolseley is not only of a fine character with butiful rich mould capable of producing anything, but the district is one of the best settled in the North West. The four townships round Wolseley are almost all taken up and under cultivation by a very superior class of settlers. The hotel in Wolseley is not only large and commodious but is run by Mr. W. D. Purley in a very superior style. That Mr. Purley has a large patronage from the numerous settlers in the district and from visitors is only to be expected in a house which is so well conducted, which possesses such a genial hospitable obliging landlord as Mr. P.

There were three steam threshers working on Friday in the vicinity of Wolseley, each employing about 15 hands. It is a busy place.

Sir John's New Honor.

THE QUEEN MAKES HIM A GRAND CROSS OF THE ORDER OF THE BATH.

LONDON, Nov. 17.—The queen has, at Mr. Gladstone's request, conferred upon Sir John Macdonald the grand cross of the order of the bath, in recognition of his eminent public services. He goes to Sandringham to visit the prince of Wales next Saturday.

The most honorable Order of the Bath is said to be originated in the time of the crusades. The ribbon is of crimson, the motto, Tria juncta in uno, (three joined in one). It is made up of military knights and civil knights grand cross, K. G. B.'s; a second class military knights and civil knights commanders, K. C. B.'s; a third class military and civil companions, C. B.'s. Sir John Macdonald was in the second class, and he has been raised to the first rank, he is now a K. C. B. Of the civil knights grand cross there are twenty-four, the Earl of Dufferin being the one last created. Of these, eighteen, including Sir John, are members of the privy council and are, most of them, eminent for service to the state.

There is no doubt the conservative party in this county will be delighted at the honor which they claim is thus done their leader, and the Mail, in its evening edition of yesterday, had a double-leaded article full of rejoicing.

The World's opinion is simply this: as long as Canada is a colony and the premier of this country is regarded as an imperial officer, or as a servant of the queen, then the queen has the right to confer on the servant the liberty to accept such distinction. We would prefer, however, to see no imperial honors accepted by Canadians.—World.

Wonderful Progress in Horse Breeding.

The great demand for large work horses has led to extreme experiments in breeding the small mares of Western ranges to large Percheron stallions. The results contrary to public belief, have proven remarkably successful. From these mares, weighing from 700 to 900 pounds, when bred to imported Percheron stallions, are produced horses that possess about one-half the united weight of sire and dam, and while partaking of the characteristics of the sire, they lose none of the endurance and hardihood of the dam, selling readily for from $100 to $200.

As the vast herds of the long-horned, gaunt Texas cattle, worth from 2 to 3 cents a pound, that appeared on our market a few years since, have been improved by the use of Short-horn and Hereford bulls until we scarcely recognize the bloodlike looking steers, worth from 5 to 6 cents a pound, now coming from the range as their descendants; so may we expect that the useless horses that are being brought from the West and Southwest and sold through the States at from $25 to $50 a head, will soon be displaced in our markets by their descendants of triple their value being of sufficient size to work, and showing the character and docility of their sires.

One of the best evidences of the success of this method of breeding is deduced from the fact that M. W. Dunham, of Wayne, Ill., the greatest importer of Draft horses in America, and from whose stables have gone out nearly all the pure bred Percheron stallions now in breeding upon Western ranges, and who has had the benefit of the experience of all those who have been breeding from stallions bought of him during the past ten years, has engaged in the business with the Messrs. Studebaker, of South Bend, Ind and John A. Witter, of Denver, Col., and invested half a million dollars in ranges and stock. The present year they are breeding about 2,000 mares to 32 of the finest imported Percheron stallions. The uniformity beauty and size of the colts produced from the range mares and imported sires, has attracted the attention of many of the progressive breeders of the West; notably the Hon. M. E. Post. Members of Congress, from Wyoming, who has one of the finest bands horses, and probably one of the largest and best ranges in that territory, consisting of 100,000 acres under fence, recently purchased. During the past Mr. Post has bought from Mr. Dunham 15 imported Percheron stallions and two imported Percheron mares; also, the Oregon Horse and Land Co., located on Snake River and owning 8,000 horses, have bought of him a large number of Percheron stallions, and are introducing them exclusively for breeding on their herd. Many other prominent stock breeders, recognizing the superiority of the Percheron cross, have been liberal purchasers of Mr. Dunham. Among them Poindexter & Orr, Conrad Kohrs, Mr. Clark, Mr. Maulden, Mr. Murphy and others of Montana; Shimpman Bros., of Northwest Ty., Mr. Latimer and Mr. McNutt, of Idaho; Mr. Dean, of Navada; Mr. Cory, Mr. Clark and Mr. Roundy, of Utah; Mr. Lot Smith. Mr. Mortison of Arizona; Mr. Starkweather and numerous others of Texas; which shows what a powerful hold this system of breeding is taken on the minds of range breeders. To supply his vast trade which penetrates every portion of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Manitoba to the Gulf $3,000,000 worth of horses have been imported from France since 1872 by M, W. Dunham, of Oaklawn, Farm, Wayne, DuPage Co., Ill., who now has on hand 500 head of pedigreed stallions and mares. 120

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Friday last Mr. W. J. Symington received a telegram informing him of the sudden death of Mrs. Symington's father, Mr. Archibald. Mr. and Mrs. Symington left on Saturday morning for Fergus to attend the funeral. Mr. Archibald was station master at Stony Point, and while attending to his duties on Friday morning staggered and fell to the ground. Friends at once ran to his assistance but life was extinct.—Dundald Herald.

QUITE EASY.—A great newspaper reader was out hunting recently, and a storm coming up he crept into a hollow log for shelter. After the storm abated, he endeavored to crawl out, but found that the log had swelled so that it was impossible to make his exit. He endeavored to compress himself as much as possible, but with indifferent success. He thought of all the mean things he had ever done, until finally his mind reverted to the fact that instead of subscribing for his local paper he was in the habit of borrowing it from his neighbor, and thus defrauding the printer. On this, he felt so small that he slipped out of the log without an effort.

Cholera is making great headway in France. It is in Paris and is daily becoming more widely spread. In all likelihoods it will be on this continent before the winter is over. The evident duty in view of such a possibility is for every one to clean up, cultivate great moderation in eating and drinking, &c., and not to allow anything like panic or fear even though the danger do come. Curious that while all profess to believe in the God of the Bible as a wise, generous, loving Father, for anyone to recommend trust in combined with prayer to Him as a due complament of all judicious care and all sanitary effort, is generally voted fanitical or sneered at as absurd. It a great deal more than curious. It is ominous for it shows that many who have plenty Christianity on their lips, have little or none of it, either in their hearts or their lives.

The following we clip from the Thornbury Standard of last week, and will explain itself. We have no doubt the Thornbury people will find it to their advantage to adopt the proposed change in shipping. "A number of our business men seem to be dissatisfied not only with the rates of the N. & N. W. Railway Company, but also with the lack of accommodation at many of the smaller stations. In consequence a scheme regarded by many as practicable and important is on hand, and that is to ship from Montreal to Markdale by the C. P. R. and team to Thornbury. Goods are shipped from Montreal to Markdale at about the same rate (at all events no more) as from Toronto to Thornbury. This has been shown time and again. In the winter season freight could be taken from Markdale to Thornbury at about 7 cents per cwt. and flour and grain shipped from Thornbury to Markdale at about the same rate. This in good sleighing we think could be done. We therefore direct the attention of our business men to this matter, and think it one well worthy their careful consideration. The nearest point of the C. P. R. to Thornbury is about 18 miles, and a team could easily make one trip a day. We think the matter should be gone into, and believe a number are now already in favor of giving it a trial during the present winter."

NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER XV.

The clock was striking twelve when the footman brought me a card with the announcement that the visitor had asked for Lady Jesmond, but that, on being told that she was from home, he had requested to see me.

Taking up the card, I read the name of Major Esmond; and I remembered that Gabrielle was living in his family when she first met Paul.

"I presume I have the pleasure of seeing Miss Gordon," he said, as he rose and bowed, "whom I already know well by report? I called on Mr. Benson as I passed through London, and he spoke much of you. I am Major Esmond. Lady Jesmond was living in my house when she met your cousin Paul."

I replied that we had often spoken of those days, and that, although Lady Jesmond was not just then at home, I felt sure she would welcome him most cordially to Jesmond Dene. I invited him to partake of some refreshment and, as he drank a glass of sherry, he told me what had brought him home.

"I have but six months' leave of absence," he said, "and I had some difficulty in getting that; but we have had a law suit in our family which has lasted sixteen years, and I have just won it. I was compelled to come to England to settle affairs; and before I left India my wife, who was warmly attached to Miss Fairfax, now Lady Jesmond, begged me to run down to Jesmond Dene to see her. I ought to have written; but, finding myself with two days to spare, I decided to come down unannounced. How is Lady Jesmond?"

"She is exceedingly well," I answered.

"I am glad of that. She was very delicate when she left India; her husband's death was a terrible blow to her."

I thought to myself that she must have changed greatly if sorrow for Paul's death had made her ill.

"It was only natural," I said.

"She was always very delicate—indeed some of us thought she would not stand the voyage," said the Major earnestly.

"In what way was she delicate?" I asked wonderingly, for Lady Jesmond had always seemed to me the very personification of health and strength.

"She seemed to be consumptive," he replied; "but I am delighted to hear that she is better."

"I have never seen or known her anything but perfectly well and robust," I said. And he repeated that he was very glad to hear it.

"Miss Fairfax was in delicate health the whole time she lived with us," continued the Major. "Mrs. Esmond was always more or less anxious about her. She will be pleased to hear of her perfect recovery. And how is little Sir Guy?"

I told him how well the boy was progressing, and what a pet he was; how every one loved and indulged him. I told him too what a devoted nurse he had; and the Major appeared perfectly delighted to hear such excellent news.

"We were very much attached to Miss Fairfax," he continued. "My children loved her as though she was one of the family. She was as good as she was beautiful."

Again the old familiar phrase that puzzled me so often! I should certainly not have described Gabrielle as being as good as she was fair.

"I have never seen anyone so perfectly patient as she was," he went on.

"Patience is the very last virtue I should attribute to Lady Jesmond," I remarked, with a smile.

"You surprise me!" he said, with a pleasant laugh. Then, changing the subject, he added, 'What a magnificent place this is, Miss Gordon! I had no idea that I should find it so large."

"Lady Jesmond was greatly surprised when she first came."

"Was she very much pleased?" he asked.

"Yes—delighted," I answered.

"I am glad to hear that," said the kind-hearted soldier. "I was afraid she would never take an interest in anything again. Hers was so entirely a love match."

I thought of her words—"Marriage proved an easy escape from the slavery of teaching; besides, which, I liked the idea of being Lady Jesmond." Evidently the Major and myself viewed the beautiful Gabrielle's character from very different stand-points.

I ordered lunch eon for Major Esmond, and then left him to rest, promising to bring Lady Jesmond to him directly she returned.

After lunch eon the Major fell asleep, and I went to sit with aunt Annette for an hour or two.

Then it occurred to me that he would probably like some coffee. It was just four o'clock when I entered the drawing-room, where he sat, to ask him. He looked the picture of comfort, with newspapers and magazines scattered on the table near him.

"If I have a weakness," said the Major, 'it is for coffee. I shall be delighted to take a cup."

In my own mind I had decided that Lord Saxon and Gabrielle would return about five, in time to rest and dress for dinner. "A whole day in the sunshine, my darling," he had whispered; and I therefore felt sure they would not hasten to return.

Suddenly, just as I was inquiring whether the Major would take milk and sugar with his coffee, I heard the sound of their voices. They had returned by what we called the road, and had passed into the courtyard instead of riding up the drive. They walked together towards the drawing-room windows, which were wide open.

She came on talking and laughing gaily, to her doom. His arm was thrown lightly around her, after his usual caressing fashion and her beautiful face wreathed in smiles, was raised to his.

"Lady Jesmond has returned," I said to the Major.

His face brightened perceptibly at the words.

Just at that moment her ladyship and Lord Saxon came to the long open glass doors, and entered the room,

The Major rose and bowed as he glanced at the beautiful woman, but there was no sign of recognition between them.

I looked at her, expecting her to welcome affectionately one who had been so devoted a friend to her and Paul. As she did not move, I went to her.

"Gabrielle," I said, "your old friend Major Esmond is on leave of absence, and has come to see you."

Then I drew back in fear and trembling for I saw that there was something terribly wrong. Her face grew colorless, while the light seemed suddenly to fade from her eyes, and a startled fear to take possession of her. I pray Heaven that I may never again witness such torture as I read on that woman's face,

She did not look at the Major. Her eyes sought Lord Saxon, and rested piteously on his handsome face. The Major seemed confused and uncomfortable.

"I am very sorry," he said hesitatingly; "I am afraid that I have made some mistake. It was Lady Jesmond, my old friend Gabrielle Fairfax, the widow of Captain Paul Jesmond, whom I called to see."

She raised her head with desperate courage, and looked into his face. There was a certain pathetic dignity in her manner as her eyes met his.

"I am Lady Jesmond," she said, proudly.

"I beg your pardon, madam," returned the Major. "I am convinced there is a great mistake somewhere. You are not the Mrs. Paul Jesmond I had the honour of knowing in India."

"I am Lady Jesmond," she repeated; but the colour did not return to her lips, nor the light to your eyes.

"You are not the widow of the late Captain Jesmond," he said.

"I am the widow of Paul Jesmond," she replied.

"You are not the mother of the child who left India in his own mother's arms!" he cried; and this time his face flushed with impatience, as he looked at the woman standing like a statue before him.

"I am the mother of little Guy," she answered.

"I swear before Heaven that you are not the same Gabrielle Fairfax who lived in my house!" he cried.

She paused a moment, then answered—

'I am Gabrielle Fairfax."

"You are not!" contradicted the Major warmly. "Who you are, madam, is best known to yourself, and does not concern me; but you are not Gabrielle Fairfax, the young lady who lived in my house, who taught my children, who married Paul Jesmond, and whom I myself gave away at the altar. Emphatically and most certainly you are not she. You might as well try to make me believe that I am the Viceroy of India."

"You may be for all that I known to the contrary," she said, with simulated pride and contempt.

"I can bring hundreds of people to prove that I am Major Esmond, I do not think, madam, that you will find one who can give truthful testimony to the fact that you are Lady Jesmond."

And then seeing that her face grew paler, and that she trembled violently, Lord Saxon went to her. She held out her arms to him, as though he were the only rock of refuge, and he clasped her to his breast with a passionate cry.

'What is it, my darling?" he said. "I do not understand. Tell me what is wrong."

She rose slowly from his circling arms, and pointed to Major Esmond.

"Nello," she exclaimed, "that man has insulted me! He is mad!"

The Major seemed rather relieved to have a man to deal with, and when the words fell from her he turned impatiently to Lord Saxon.

"I am sane enough," he said; "but, mad or sane, I persist in denying that that lady is Gabrielle Fairfax or Lady Jesmond."

CHAPTER XVI.

Major Esmond, who had at first seemed anxious and distressed, now stood erect and at ease, evidently with the consciousness of one who had suddenly realized that he was to be the means of exposing what at present looked like a gigantic fraud. The smile which had rested on his handsome face was no longer there; a stern grave expression had taken its place. Lord Saxon looked perplexed and bewildered, but his face was full of love and tenderness, and turned always toward the woman beside him.

No idea that she could be an impostor had ever occurred to me—indeed the frank and open way in which she had spoken of her past life, of her marriage, of my cousin Paul, of the fact that she had never been in love until now, seemed to me guarantees of her identity and honesty. But there was fear in the agonised face now raised beseechingly to her lover—startled, terrible fear; and, if she was innocent, why need she tremble at the visit of one who had acted as a father towards her?

Lord Saxon, drawing her nearer to him turned angrily to Major Esmond.

"This lady,' he said, 'is soon to become my wife; anything you may have to say against her or about her will be my affair, not hers."

'With all the pleasure in the world," rejoined Major Esmond. "I have nothing to say against the lady—how could I when this is the first time I have seen her? How could I, either, say anything about her when she is an entire stranger to me?"

"You deny her identity!" cried Lord Saxon.

"I do not indeed. I simply affirm and repeat that this lady is not Gabrielle Fairfax, who lived as governess in my house. I seem," continued the Major, "to have hit upon some family secret or mystery of which I know nothing. The case seems simple enough to me. The young lady whom I seek lived in my house, where she was treated with the utmost kindness and affection. We were present at her marriage; we had the same warm feeling for her afterwards. When I was returning to England, my wife's first request was that I should call upon Gabrielle Fairfax, now Lady Jesmond. At some inconvenience to myself I came hither, desiring to see the young girl I had befriended and helped. I find brought to me as Lady Jesmond a total stranger—a beautiful woman, but a total stranger to me—and you are angry because I speak out and say so. I am sorry I came. I wish I had been a thousand miles away; but, being here, I must speak the truth. This lady who calls herself Lady Jesmond is not Gabrielle Fairfax who lived with us. Our Gabrielle Fairfax," he continued, "was a fragile delicate girl with a fair angelic face which had a consumptive look. Her eyes were gray, and her hair was more brown than golden. I swear before Heaven that this lady is not the bride whom I gave away to be Paul Jesmond's wife. You doubt me," said the Major, looking towards Lord Saxon. "I can give you positive proof of the truth of what I say." Then he looked round upon us, as if specially to engage our attention. "Listen—I can give you overwhelming proof that this lady is not Gabrielle Fairfax. You know—all my friends know—that Miss Fairfax lived in my house for two years; it is also well known that I gave her away at her marriage. Now I appeal to you, Miss Gordon, and to you, Lord Saxon, to take note of this—not only did I utterly fail to recognize Lady Jesmond when she entered the room, but she also failed to recognize me. Was it not so? I appeal to you both. Did she recognize me?"

We were compelled to answer "No."

"The Gabrielle Fairfax who left my house in tears because she loved us all so well would have come to me as a daughter, would have taken my hand in affectionate greeting, would have bidden me a hundred times welcome to her home. If this be Lady Jesmond; why did she meet me in silence and without recognition? There is no answer to the question: there can be none. One of two things must be clear to you, Miss Gordon, and to you, Lord Saxon. Either I am not Major Esmond, or this lady is not Gabrielle Fairfax. Now I am prepared to prove my identity. To begin—I am personally well known to the Commander-in-Chief and to many of the officials at the Horse Guards; and I can bring more than a hundred gentlemen, all men of position, to prove that I am Major Esmond. I will wait here, if you wish it, until more than sufficient evidence is brought to prove it. When it is conclusively proved, it will be for you to find out who this lady is whom you have received as Lady Jesmond."

Lord Saxon looked at me with fear and dismay depicted on his face. His eyes sought mine with a horrible questioning in them.

"I received Lady Jesmond," I said; "and I never had the least doubt as to her identity. She came here with her infant son, and at once took up her position as mistress of Jesmond Dene. Mr. Benson, too," I added, "was fully satisfied as to the validity and genuiness of her claim."

"I am sorry I should be the means of creating so much unpleasantness," returned the Major: "but justice should be done. The lady will pardon me, perhaps, if I ask her a few questions. What, for instance, were the names of my three children?"

She made no answer, but clung more closely to her lover.

"Can you tell me one detail of the wedding—where it took place,—the name of the clergyman who married you? Can you describe the dress you wore? What happened just as we were leaving the church?"

Again she did not reply, but flung her arms round her lover's neck, crying despairingly—

'Oh, Nello, Nello!"

"I do not think," said the Major quietly, "that there is any need to prolong this painful scene. I will relieve you of my presence, and then the lady may be inclined to throw some light upon the matter. Then, turning to me, he said, 'I thank you. Miss Gordon, for your kindness and hospitality. I should have been very glad to help you to solve the mystery; but perhaps you will let me hear the solution before I leave England. I need hardly add that you may rely upon my silence,"

'Stay!" cried Lord Saxon. "You must not leave us in this suspense."

"There is no suspense," rejoined the Major. "You may take it as an established fact that this lady is not Lady Jesmond." Then, as if suddenly remembering something, he added quickly, "I can give you another and what ought to be an overwhelming proof of what I say. I had forgotten it until just this moment. The clergyman who married Gabrielle Fairfax and Captain Jesmond is now in London. He was sent home on the sick-list, and arrived in England last month. The proper and most satisfactory course would be to telegraph for him. I can give you his address. He is a friend of mine, and he knew Miss Fairfax. Let him come, and we will abide by his decision."

"Oh, Nello, Nello," cried the unhappy girl, "not that, not that!"

"Shall it be so;" asked his lordship. "If this clergyman can prove that the Major is wrong and you are right, by all means let him come."

But she clung to him, weeping passionate tears, and cried—

'Not that! Oh, Nello, Nello, not that!"

"Will you not see him?" asked Lord Saxon gently.

"No, no—a thousand times no!" she cried.

'Tell me why you will not see him, Gabrielle;" he said, gazing on the face he loved so well. "If he, by seeing you for a moment, can disprove what the Major asserts, and prove your truth, why not see him?',

"Yes," put in the Major quietly, "why not see him?"

'Say 'Yes,' Gabrielle," said her lover. "It is an easy way of meeting the difficulty Do you not see, my darling, that if you refuse this test it will look like guilt?"

But his entreaties were all in vain.

"No man," said the Major, "ever found himself in such a painful position, I do believe; yet, if there has been a fraud, it should be exposed."

"Do not use the word 'fraud' in connection with this lady!" cried Lord Saxon, with a darkening face.

"I have no wish to do so; but, if she is not Lady Jesmond, is she not guilty of a most wicked fraud, one that no honest man could ever tolerate or forgive?"

"Nello, Nello!" cried Lady Jesmond: and the drooping figure nearly slipped from his grasp, while the colourless face drooped heavily upon his breast,

"I believe," he cried, turning with hot anger to the Major, "that you have killed her."

"It is not I who have killed her," said the Major gravely. "I am merely the instrument by which a cruel wrong has been found out."

Lord Saxon laid the beautiful unconscious figure on the couch.

"Come to her, Felicia," he cried excitedly; "she's in a dead swoon!"

Major Esmond turned to Lord Saxon and looked straight into his face.

"It is natural," he said, "that, loving this lady, you would espouse her cause; but your prejudice should not blind you to the claims of simple justice. Miss Gordon is bound to give up all in favor of the true Lady Jesmond, but not to a fraudulent stranger. I should like to see the child," he continued, as if expecting that the fraud had extended even to the substitution of another child for Paul's.

I rang the bell, standing before Lady Jesmond to screen her from observation, and told the servant who appeared to tell Mrs. Rivers to bring down little Sir Guy to the drawing-room without delay.

"It is hardly a scene for a servant to witness," said the Major.

But I assured him that the nurse was a confidential servant whom Lady Jesmond trusted implicitly.

I shall never forget Mrs. Rivers's face when she entered the room. She looked from one to the other with wild questioning eyes, and an anticipation of coming danger seemed to come to her.

Major Esmond took the child from her arms and looked critically at the boy's pretty features.

"I know not," he said, after a pause; "where the mother may be, but this certainly Paul Jesmond's child."

"What is the matter?" cried Mrs. Rivers. What is wrong?"

And on her face I noticed the same deadly fear and dismay that had taken possession of Lady Jesmond.

NAVIGATION OF THE AIR.

The Propulsive Power Attained from an Induced Current.

Amongst the latest patents applied for by Pittsburg inventors is one for a novel airship, constructed on principles entirely different from any hitherto employed. The inventor is John Heatley, a furnace builder in Friend's mill, on the Southside. Mr. Heatley is one of the oldest furnace builders in the city, being at present sixty years of age. It is now fifteen years since the inventor first conceived the idea of his ship, and since that time he has been steadily engaged, during his spare hours, in perfecting his plans. During his long experience in furnace building, Mr. Heatley often noticed, with surprise, the terrible force of the air current in the stack flue, which in some cases was strong enough to carry boards, pieces of wood and other articles within its reach up with it. It was the force of this draft which suggested to him the idea of his invention, and application is made of it. The mechanical principle of the proposed machine is substantially that of a rocket, the force being continuous according to will, however, and the direction of motion, according to Mr. Heatley, being variable.

Mr. Heatley was seen recently at his home on Steuben street, West End. The gentleman is by no means a crank on the subject, still is perfectly confident of the success of his scheme. He is not in affluent circumstances, but said that with the aid of a number of gentlemen who have become interested in the invention he will soon construct a machine and subject it to a personal test.

Mr. Heatley exhibited a drawing of the proposed machine to a reporter for the Dispatch and entered into an explanation of its parts. It consists first of an ordinary globular gas balloon surmounted by a light cross-piece, the ends of which carry four ropes from which the car or ship is suspended. Mr. Heatley argued that the balloon will be entirely unnecessary after it has performed its function of taking the vessel up into its proper medium, and that it will after that prove more of an obstacle than otherwise.

The car, as at present designed, will be shaped like a deep scow and will be constructed of light wicker work with strong oaken ribs. Both the bow and stern of the craft will have strong pieces of oak attached to them laterally, which will form the mountings for two broad rollers or pulleys, adjustable to a slight limit either sideways, up or down, by means of screws, and the object of which will be explained hereafter.

The car contains in its centre a heater shaped somewhat like a trunk, but tapering down to a conical flue at the bow of the boat. The heater consists merely of an air chamber with circular openings at the two ends. The fuel pan is under this heater, and can be fed with coal oil, which will be used, from the end.

Through the axis of the heater runs a wide pipe, projecting at the bow and stern ends of the apparatus, which is called the "inducer" by the inventor. The pipe is constructed in two pieces, which fit together by a bevel, the stern one being called the "socket" and the bow one the "plunger." The plunger may be screwed towards the bow end, thus creating an opening through which the hot air may escape out of the inducer towards the stern of the vessel. It is argued by the inventor that the passage of this hot air current towards the stern will cause a tremendous suction of cold air through the inducer from the bow to the stern. A partial vacuum before the bow will be the result, and the ship will move in an opposite direction from the current.

The steering apparatus of the machine consists in principle of appliances for slightly changing the direction of the draft. The guiding of the ship will not therefore be sudden but in long sweeping arches. The attachment will be substantially as follows: A broad, endless belt, supplied with numerous gum pockets will run over the two pulleys mentioned above through the inductor and under the car. The pockets open towards the bow ends of the boat, and as the draft passes through the inductor the pockets will be inflated. The pockets will then shoot out of the stern end of the inductor with lightning rapidity, a fact which will add much to the impetus of the machine.

Sufficient play is allowed in the inducing tube so as not to cause a bumping of the pockets on the sides of it, when the pulleys are slightly moved by means of this adjusting screw. Mr. Heatley says that but one of the pulleys need be made adjustable, so that the whole management of the vessel, including firing, can be done at the bow. The smoke and gases from the burning coal oil will escape through the conical stern end of the heater, which is double-walled, and will mark the trail of the vessel as it glides through the air.

Mr. Heatly claims that the vessel will be able to beat against a heavy wind, although either up and down, or right and left tacking may be necessary. He says he has carefully computed the weight of all parts, and the force of current necessary to move the machine, and that he will be able to induce over sufficient force. Mr. O. D. Lewis has entered the application for a patent, and whereas yesterday remarked that a number of mechanical engineers and scientific men versed in the theory of aeronautics had examined the invention and uttered favorable opinions.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A Large Railroad Station—Gigantic Railroad Scheme—Water Chestnuts—Shocking Occurrence—&c., &c.

The English city of Birmingham now has the largest railroad station in the world. It is just finished at a cost of $2,000,000.

It is said that naphtha residum is to be experimented with by Russian naval officers, with the view of using it to heat the boilers of the imperial Black Sea fleet. Should the result be satisfactory, the use of coal will be abandoned in favor of the more potent fuel.

The German government is reported to be highly satisfied with the new torpedo boat which was tried at the recent manœuvres of the fleet. Besides possessing great strength and speed, the boat has water compartments which enable it to be suddenly filled and its deck sunk to the level of the sea without seriously impairing its rapid motion.

The extending destitution in Paris is attested by the amount of the budget of the public assistance for next year, as just submitted to the Paris municipal council. Its total is 42 000 000 francs, being some 4,500,000 francs more than the budget for this year. It is calculated that the number of individuals requiring assistance in various forms will be 406 000.

An imposing sculpture of a lion was unveiled at Belfort, the other day, as a memorial of Col. Denfert Locherau, who defended the town in 1870, and the Thiers, who saved it from annexation to Germany by threatening to renew the war sooner than sacrifice it. Belfort was the only siege in which the Germans were unsuccessful. It opened its gates only on the armistice which followed the capitulation of Paris.

In the middle of the performance of Wagner's "Gotterdammerung" at the Court theatre at Munich the other night, a gentleman named Hummel, an architect from Vienna, suddenly became mad, and just as the music of the third act was commencing he made a violent attack on a lady who was sitting near him. Seizing her by the throat the lunatic nearly throttled her, when the police interfered, and with difficulty succeeded in removing him from the house.

Journalists have been excused from serving on juries in India, the judge, in so deciding, following the precedent laid down by another judge in Natal. He went so far as to say that all reporters should be excused from serving on a jury because, through their presence at preliminary examinations and inquiries, for the purpose of publishing the same as news, they might be in possession of facts which might come out in evidence, and probably they would have prejudged the case.

The German and Russian newspapers have referred to another gigantic railway scheme believed to be entertained by the Russian government—to wit, a great Pacific railway running from Ekaterinogburg, through Tobolsk, Yeniseisk, and Irkutsk, to Nicholaievsk on the Amoor, with one branch to Irkutsk and Kiakhta, another to Herat and India, and a third to Bokhara and Kashgar. This wonderfull scheme is to have 21,000 versts of road, and to cost 1 million of rubles, or 50,000,009 rubles per year for twenty years.

Irrespective of the large number of books recently ordered by the civil administration to be withdrawn from public circulation, the holy synod at St. Petersburg has also now established a new Index Expurgatorius, including over seventy books and religious tracts, mostly distributed by the Pashkovites. Pashkoff himself was very lately expelled the country. A large number of English evangelical tracts were a short time ago seized and burnt, although they had already been approved by the ecclesiastical censors.

In that healthy seaside resort, Swanage, isle of Purbeck, Dorset, with a population of 2 350, there were living no fewer than 148 persons between the age of 70 and 92, in November, 1882, and the number at present is about the the same. The names of these persons were taken by the rate collector, assisted by a native inhabitant, who is now aged 80. The oldest inhabitant, now 94, may by seen daily, taking his walk alone. In Dorsetshire, the proportion of people over 70 to the population is one in 51, whilst in Swanage it is one in 16.

Lieut. Ludovisi, who struck and insulted a brother officer, and shot him dead in the duel which followed, was tried by court-martial at Rome the other day for the former offense, and condemned to two years' military seclusion and the forefeiture of his commission. The court-martial took no cognizance of the duel; for, while the penal code regards dueling as a crime, though a very venial one, the regulations of the Italian army compel an officer to fight with anyone who insult or challenges him, on pain of expulsion from the army.

"Water chestnuts" (eaten by the old lake dwellers in Switzerland) are largely grown in China. Every canal is full of floating islands of them; and the gathering looks like the picture of Athelhey in flood where young and old are going about after the apples in boats. Instead of boats put tubs, each pushed with bamboo poles by a yellow mat or woman, and paint two or three upsets, for John Chinaman is full of fun, and those who have seen a water chestnut harvesting say that everybody is on the broad grin, and accepts a ducking with the same good humor with which he gives one.

A curious instance, says The Pall Mall Gazette, concerning the extraordinary variety of influences which affect English trade is afforded by the late trade report from Sheffield. Owing to the drought in Queensland, which reduced the flocks of one great holder from 27,000 to 5,000, large orders for sheep-shears and other hardware had been canceled, much to the inconvenience of the capital of cutlery. On the other hand, the success of the 100 ton gun at Spezia in smashing the armor-plates supplied by Krupp is likely to lead to the placing of new Italian orders for compound armor-plates with the Sheffield platemakers.

The most perfect and comprehensive application of electricity to lighting ships of war has been attained on board the British iron-clad Colossus by the use of the Anglo-American Brush system. The most remote parts of the vessel are illuminated, incandescent lamps being used below decks and three powerful search lights and incadescent yard-arm lights above. The interior illumination is effected by 150 lights of 20 and 240 lights of 10-candle power. At the recent trial at Portsmouth the three dynamos and engines were run for six hours continuously with a full load of 180 ampers and an electro motive force equal to 80 volts. The dynamos rotated at the rate of 400 revolutions a minute with 40 pounds presure of steam

The London Vegetarian Society gave a dinner to about 120 ladies and gentleman at the Health Exhibition the other day. The object of the dinner, which is one of a series, was to show how an ample and varied diet could be procured without the use of any sort of animal food. The menu included, among other dishes, "Chestnutina de Lyon" soup, pea fritters, and fried onions, and barley pudding. After the dinner Dr. Ridge delivered a short address in which he laid stress upon the fact that it had been abundantly proved that a vegetarian diet was not only possible but profitable, and expressed his conviction that the excessive use of condiments was the cause of a large proportion of dyspeptic illness. It was also believed that vegetarians lived much longer than flesh-eating members of the community.

Another murder has been committed in Vienna, somewhat resembling that in the Matzleinsdorfer strasse; the scene on this occasion being the Schaeffer Gasse, which is in a much more central part of the city. Early on Saturday morning an invalid bachelor of 46, named Kostler, a retired officer, whose only attendant was an old woman, was attacked by a youth of about 20, who had been seen for some time prowling about the neighborhood, and who took advantage of the absence of the old woman to enter the house and attack Herr Kostler with a hatchet, completely shattering his skull. He next searched all the drawers, finding only a silver watch and about 1 florin in money. He then left as quietly as he came. On the housekeeper's return Herr Kostler was found conveyed to the hospital, where he died soon afterward. On the 16th inst., a woman named Schinke was similarly murdered in her own shop. Both murderers are still at large.

What do the Chinese Eat?

When I was at Lake View, in August, at the New England Assembly, and having a "real nice time" telling the children about China in the headquarters of the C. Y. E. R. U., one day, I was accosted by a bright little girl, who wished to know "what people eat in China, and whether those dreadful stories about eating rats were true."

I answered as well as a few words would serve me, but did not satisfy the curiosity of the eager inquirer, Later, I devoted a half hour to talking about the "Daily Food of the Chinese," to some forty boys and girls; and here I repeat the matter for the sake of others curious to learn the truth—trusting a little natural indignation and plain speaking may be excused me.

Americans are fond of wonderful stories. Nothing pleases them more than to hear something revolting or strange about other people. Nations and races who resemble themselves, are not worth attention. Hence, travellers—knowing fellows, all of them—possibly find it profitable to startle them with accounts as marvellous as they are false. Not that these accounts any always wholly untrue, but that solitary instances and occurrences are magnified to represent habits and customs of a whole people.

Belonging to this class of accounts, are those relative to the use as food in China, of certain animals. I find that many Americans believe that dog soup, cat fricassee and rat a la mode. are to be found daily on every table in the Empire. The fact is that there are some peculiar people in China, as elsewhere, credulous and superstitious; and some of these believe that the flesh of those animals I have mentioned possesses medical properties. For instance, some silly women believe that the flesh of rats restores the hair. Some believe that dog meat, also cat meat, renews the blood, and quacks often prescribe it. Then it is also true that there are very poor people who have no money to buy proper food, and therefore subsist upon what they can get, rather than starve. But I have lived fifteen years of my life in China, and have had experience at public banquets, social dinners and ordinary meals, and in company with all classes of people, but I have never seen cat, dog or rat, served in any form whatever.

"What then do the Chinese eat?"

Our gardens are prodigal of vegetables; our ponds, rivers and lakes swarm with fish; our farm-yards are crowded with pigs, land fowls, ducks and geese; our fields are gilded three times every year with ripening rice. In some sections of the Empire wheat and barley are produced; but rice is our usual substitute for bread. These articles make up the everyday food of the people. But there are certain things unknown to your tables that are considered great delicacies by everybody, one of which I have told you about already—edible birds' nests. Another is sharks' fins.

The Chinese do not keep many cows, and it is true that beef is not esteemed as good as pork, and that many will not eat beef on account of religious scruples. Milk, butter and cheese are almost unknown articles of diet. The Chinese think it is robbing the calves to take milk from the cows.—[You Phou Lee, in November Wide Awake.

Throwing down the Gauntlet.

From time immemorial throwing down the gauntlet has been a symbol of defiance, a challenge to battle both in real contests and in the mimic warfare of tournaments. Virgil in the Fifth Book of the Æneid, as we have seen, represents Enteilus as casting a gauntlet on the ground before entering the lists with Dares. In the Middle Ages, when the leaders of opposing armies challenged each other to single combat, a herald bearing a glove was sent with the message, Shakespeare makes Henry the Fifth, when he engages under an incognito in a wordy dispute with one of his soldiers on the eve of the battle of Agincourt, exchange gloves with him as a proof that if they both survive the battle the quarrel shall be settled with blows. Amongst the Highlanders the custom of employing the glove as a sign of challenge given or vengeance to be taken lingered long. "Did one of them break faith? The surest remedy was for the injured person to appear at the next-meeting place, bearing a glove upon the point of a lance, and proclaim the perfidy. The symbol aroused so keen a sense of right, so fervently appealed to their rough justice, that the offender was often slain by his own clan to wipe out the disgrace brought upon them," To bite the glove was the sure prelude of a quarrel:

> Stern Rutherford right litt'e said,
> But bit h.s glove and shook his head.

BEDLAM IN A VAN.

Scenes Attending the Transfer of Patients of an Insane Asylum.

"We are all going to heaven, girls; come on; get in quick."

A big furniture van stood in the yard of the old Essex county insane asylum at Newark yesterday afternoon, and the remark was made by one of the patients as she sprang in and took a seat The other female patients caught the infection, and, to the great relief of the doctor and attendants followed like a flock of sheep until the van was filled. Then the van was driven to the new asylum buildings, on South Orange avenue, near the limits of the city. About 150 women and 100 men were removed, and although excitement ran high among the inmates of the asylum from the moment the change was announced, the only trouble experienced was with one woman who insisted that she owned the old building and refused to leave it. A dozen trips of the van accomplished the removal of all the inmates. With some of them a great deal of persuasive talking was required to get them into the van, and one of the male patients would get in only on being told that they were going to church. Then he said, "Good, I'll go, and I'll pray for Newark once more. Newark needs praying for." One old man took command of the forces as "Gen. Grant," and endeavoured to marshal his companions into line. The curious scenes were repeated when the patients arrived at the new building, and the greatest tact was needed to keep down the excitement. Some of the patients screamed the names of their relatives with delight when they saw the new structure, and evidently thought they were returning to their old homes. One woman looked around curiously and then, putting her hands on her lips, said: "This will do very nicely. This is my house and I want it distinctly understood." Some of the patients were delighted with the elevator and wanted to stay in it and ride up and down, while others shrank in terror from it and had to be taken up the stairs.

The new building is an imposing structure extending three hundred feet on South Orange avenue, with two wings of nearly equal extent. Over the main doorway is the word "Retreat" carved in relief on the capstone in massive letters. The old building on Camden street is a rambling frame structure. It is proposed to use it as the city hospital.—[New York Herald.

WEALTH IN THE GUTTER.

The Pickers up of Unconsidered Trifles in the Street.

Notwithstanding some drawbacks and occasional periods of stagnation the rag business of the United States, particularly of the west, appears to be flourishing, and has reached wonderful proportions both as to quantities handled and in value. The miserable creature with bag or basket in hand collecting what can be found in the alley-way does not seem much in the world's concerns, but to the wholesale dealer the ragged, bent old collector is a much more important item in the business community than many might suspect. In these days of vast figures we are not apt to be very much surprised when we hear of a wholesale dry goods or hardware firm doing a business aggregating $1,000 000 a year, but that a mere dealers in rags and wastes could under any circumstances reach that figure does seem a little startling. It is nevertheless the case, and is but another illustration of the wonderful business spirit and possibilities of the great west.

There is one firm of rag and waste dealers in this city doing a business amounting to $1 000,000 a year, and the business is constantly increasing. There is another firm of paper manufacturers in this city whose business, exclusive of what it supplies to its own mills in Wisconsin, exceeds half a million dollars annually. There are several houses dealing exclusively in rags whose business ranges from $100,000 to $500,000 a year, while there are several smaller ones whose custom is by no means contemptible, but, on the contrary, in most cases quite up to the average volume reached by the more assuming retail dry goods, hardwares, boot and shoe, clothing and grocery stores, a great many of which think they are doing remarkably well if they have a business of from $25,000 to $50 000 a year. There is not a rag dealer in the city, and there are thirty-six of them, according to the directory, that does not control a business of from $5,000 to $10,000 a year, and a noteworthy peculiarity of the trade, they claim, is that there is hardly ever, if ever, any one in it who fails or compels a compromise with cheated creditors, although they have to pay cash for their goods every time, carry a stock ranging from $1,000 to $100,000 or more, and sell on two, three, four and six months' credit.

It is estimated the total amount of this business done in the city exceeds $5,000,000 annually, even at the unusually low figures at which some grades of rags are held in the market at present. The number of hands employed is not less than 5,000, including 1,000 set aside as the quota engaged, bag or basket in hand, gathering up what they can and where they can throughout the city and its suburbs.

Will Blood Stains Wash Out?

To the present day the superstition is rife that blood stains cannot be washed out. During the French Revolution eighty priests were massacred in the Carmelite chapel at Paris, and the stains (called) of their blood are pointed out to-day. Sir Walter Scott, in his "Tales of a Grandfather" declares that the blood stains of David Rizzio, the Italian private secretary of Mary Queen of Scots, who was stabbed in Holyrood Palace by certain Protestant leaders of her court aided by her husband, Darnley, are still to be seen. In Lancashire the natives show a stone called the 'Bloody Stone,' which was so marked show Heaven's displeasure at some of Cromwell's atrocities at Gallow's Croft. In "Macbeth," act 5, scene 1, Shrkespeare alludes to the idea: "Yet here's a spot." The truth about blood not washing out can easily be explained. In the first place, if that of a murdered person, it is not often attempted. In the next place, blood contains oxide of iron which sinks deep into the fibre of wood, and proves indelible to ordinary washing. Thus it is true that stone of porous nature and wood not of the hardest kind are susceptible to the stain of blood produced by the oxide of iron which the blood contains. But the blood of a pig is as good as that of a murdered man.

A TALE OF GRISLY HORROR.

A Half-Burned Corpse Found Sitting Upright in a Chair.

In a little two-story on Keokuk street and Oregon avenue, St. Louis, in a kitchen on the lower floor, William Klittich came to his death under circumstances full of grisly horror. He was married a couple of years since to a pretty young woman, a typical German blonde, with soft blue eyes and child like face, with whom his life, according to the common testimony of those who knew them, was a home-spun idyl. Klittich was a carpenter, a hard-working and saving man, whose ambition has been to own his own house. About a month since Klittich had money enough ahead to begin to build. He was in the habit of getting up at night to go over to the new place, only half a square away, to see that no one was attempting any depredation, and hence it was that when Mrs. Klittich awoke at 5.30 this morning and found her husband absent from her side she paid no attention to the fact. A little later she arose and dressed, and as she did so she noticed a smell of burning meat which pervaded the house. Wondering she went out into the kitchen, carrying her bedroom lamp with her. There was a light in the kitchen, a creeping, flickering light that shot up and down and flared, now dimly, now fiercely, and it was some moments before the young wife realized that her dead husband was wrapped in fire.

Shriek upon shriek rang out then, and in a few moments the family living upon the upper floor ran in. The flames hissed away into a sickening steam as bucket after bucket of water was cast upon the dead, and then for the first time. The frightened men and women had time to look at what was before them.

Belt upright in the chair sat the corpse, with his arms arrested at his sides as though death had come while he was lifting them to his head. His clay pipe lay in a pool of water at his feet, and later his revolver was found a little behind the chair. His right side, his head, his back and arms were simply a charred and blackened cinder that had been flesh. His clothes were burned away mostly, and the back of the chair even had given way to the fire. The pose of the corpse was not that of one who had died in great agony. The lips were serene and the burned mustache gave a jaunty air to the mouth, as though the last thought that had played across the dead countenance had been a pleasant one.

When the reporter saw the body some effort at decorum had been made. A sheet with horrible greasy stains had been cast over the formless horror, yet despite the fact that loving hands had been at work, the view was awful. Instead of the normal ghastliness of death this body was marked with black baked chars, and there was a ghastly effect where the right ear and the hair had all baked into one pitch-like whole, intensely distressing to look upon or remember. The shirt and trousers and the underclothes were burned chiefly on the right side over the heart, and the flame had slowly eaten its way through the chair back and through all of the trousers not protected by the pressure of the body from the air.

The Coroner held an inquest and post-mortem this afternoon, and after an exhaustive examination of all the incidents of the tragedy, came to the conclusion that Klittich had either died suddenly in his chair while smoking, or had shot himself in the stomach, where it was found the bullet missing from the revolver had gone; that his pipe had dropped from his relaxed mouth and that the fire had fallen inside his vest, where it had speedily kindled into a flame.

A CHECKERED CAREER.

"Chawed" by a Tiger, Bitten by a Moccasin, Struck by Lightning, Tried for Murder, and Dying a Natural Death.

The death of Thomas Stewart in Berrien county removes a singular character from the scene of life, writes a correspondent from Milledgeville, Ga. He first appeared there in 1845. He was not remarkable for anything except for scrawniness, being of small stature, lean and of a clay bank color, the result perhaps of private meals off of the chimney clay. But as time sped by he became a hero in that then wild country; at least he was a hero in one sense.

The family with whom he lived resided not far from the Alapaha swamp. One day he and another boy were sent to the swamp to feed a sow. When within a short distance of it a large American tiger or jaguar sprang out of the bushes and brought Stewart to the ground. He fell on his face, and the jaguar seemed to be in no hurry to kill him. Indeed, the brute was engaged just then in watching the other boy fleeing in the direction of the house. Being satisfied as to the direction the other boy took, the beast then took Stewart's head in its mouth and closed on it, but its teeth slipped over instead of penetrating the skull. It bit the boy's skull several times, with the same result, and the boy, with a presence of mind wonderful in one so young, did, not once flinch while the animal was tearing huge furrows through his scalp. The tiger, after holding its nose near the boy's face an instant, as if listening if he was breathing, seemed satisfied that he was dead, and hastily covering him up with pine straw ran hurriedly after the other boy. As soon as the creature was out of sight Stewart sprang to his feet, and, taking a wide circuit, ran with all the speed he could command, and finally reached the house in safety. The other boy reached the house some time before the tiger came in sight of it, and the brute, seeing that he was too late, hurried back to his first prey.

If Stewart had moved while the tiger was biting his skull, or if he had breathed while the beast was listening, with its nose close to his face, he would have been torn into fragments; but the boy, having heard of many of the peculiarities of this ferocious beast, was prepared to profit by the knowledge.

The neighbors rallied at once, and were successful in killing the jaguar, which they found a little farther on in the swamp.

A few years after the above occurrence, Stewart, while feeding a cane mill, had one of his hands caught and drawn in between the rollers and so badly mashed that the hand and a portion of the arm withered.

Later on he was in the field at work, when a thunder storm came up and he was struck by lightning and left for dead. He came to, however, and was all right in a few days.

By this time he was old enough to take unto himself a wife, but the parents of his girl did not favor the alliance, so they decided on elopement. In those days, even, a hero could get married without shoes, so he started for his future wife, succeeded in getting her from the house, and the happy pair were on their way to the parson's when Stewart was bitten on the foot by a moccasin, a dangerous reptile. Even that did not stop him. They proceeded to the parson's and were united in wedlock. Stewart did not die from the snake bite. History does not say whether the snake died.

Next we hear of Stewart, he was being tried for his life for the murder of a man named Wheeler. The evidence was all against Stewart, and everybody thought he would hang. He was defended by the now venerable Judge Hansell, of Thomasville, Ga., then a young lawyer just "starting out." So able was the defense, so pathetically did the young lawyer dwell upon the many hair breadth escapes of the prisoner, who seemingly had been preserved through them all through providential intervention, that the jury brought in such a verdict as sent him to the penitentiary for six years. While in the penitentiary he learned the painter's trade, and after satisfying the sentence of the law, returned home.

SCIENTIFIC MISCELLANY.

The sawdust and refuse of the sawmill is now made to yield fourteen gallons of turpentine, three or four gallons of rosin and a quantity of tar per cord.

Civilization has its drawbacks. It is said that not only has the acuteness of vision of civilized man fallen below the standard common among savage nations, but at the same time the eyes of civilized man often depart from the normal or approximately spherical formation, either becoming flattened from front to back so as to bring the retina too near the surface, or elongated from front to back, so as to remove the retina too far from the surface.

Mercury is firmly believed by the Chinese to possess wonderful virtues. They hold that it not only prolongs life, but expels bad vapors, poison, and the gloom of an uneasy mind. The doctrine of the transmutation of mercury into other metals prevailed 2,000 years ago. Cinnabar was known to the Chinese in the seventh century before the Christian era.

Two ounces of soda dissolved in a quart of hot water will make a ready and useful solution for cleaning old painted work preparatory to repainting. This mixture, in the above proportions, should be applied when warm, and the wood work afterwards washed with water to remove all traces of the soda.

The average specific gravity of bricks is 1.841; the weight of a cubic foot, 115 pounds which absorbs one fifteenth of its weight of water; the cohesive force of a square inch is 275 pounds; it is crushed by a force of 562 pounds on a square inch; the weight of a cubic foot of newly built brickwork is 117 pounds; the weight of a rod of new brick work is sixteen tons.

Two methods are in use in Philadelphia to prevent chemical obstructions in water pipes. One is to coat the interior of the pipe with coal tar pitch, which does well enough for large mains and keeps the passage tolerably clear for more than a quarter of a century. The other method is the one called "bower-barff," which consists in subjecting the pipes at a high temperature to the action of steam or air, so that there is a film of magnetic oxide acquired by the metal, which insures a clean surface for a long time.

In a communication to the Physiological Society at Berlin Dr. Falk stated, as a result of his researches on drowning, that when rabbits are suddenly plunged into water having a temperature of 40 or 50° F., cramp of the expiratory muscles occurs and respiration ceases. The methods of restoring the apparently dead have no relation to the effect of cutaneous stimulation upon respiration. Cold water dashed upon the chest acts on the heart alone; on the naps of the neck it acts upon the lower brain.

A German technical journal says that the advantage gained in having the flesh side of the leather soles of boots and shoes outside is mainly the peculiar facility it affords in the application of grease for preserving the leather, since the pores are so much larger, besides permitting the introduction of fine sands or iron fingers, etc., which increase the resistance to wear. Again if the more compact portion of the leather be outside, when the outer layer is worn away it leaves the interior in a soft and tender state, which abrades very rapidly, while if the soft side be first exposed it may be protected, as above mentioned, and when removed leaves a compact layer, even when worn down almost to the thinness of paper.

She Might Have Been Queen.

News has reached this city of the death of Mrs. Barnice Panahi Bishop, the wife of Charles Reed Bishop, at her residence in Honolulu, Sandwich Islands. For years she had been afflicted with a cancer, to which her untimely end was undoubtedly due. Mrs. Bishop was the highest chief in the Sandwich Islands, her maiden name being Barnice Panahi. On the death of Kamehameha V., the last of the original line of native kings, in 1872, she was offered the throne, but declined it. When king Lunalilo died in 1874 she was again recognized as the heir to the throne, and again declined preferring to remain in private life. Years ago she became the wife of Charles H. Bishop, a native of New York, who went to the Sandwich Islands in 1847, and after pursuing various branches of business, finally settled down as the senior partner in the banking firm of Bishop & Co. He has acquired a large fortune, and his wife was the wealth-woman on the Islands in her own right. She was a woman of wide culture, the leader of the best society in Honolulu, and her elegant, graceful and generous hospitality is remembered by all Americans of character who have visited the Islands. She had travelled extensively, both in Europe and the United States, her last visit to this country having been made in 1876. When travelling abroad she invariably registered herself as "the Hon. Lady Bishop." She was about fifty years of age.

The detractor may, and often does, pull down others, but he never, as he seems to suppose, elevates himself to their position. The most he can do is maliciously to tear from them the blessings which he cannot enjoy himself.

The Standard.

MARKDALE NOV. 27, 1884.

CLEVELAND'S MOTTO.

No Harm Shall Come to any Business Interest in the County.

THE BROADEST MINDS TO GOVERN.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 22.—The Albany correspondent to the Times had interviewed President-elect Cleveland yesterday, in the course of which he said:—"No harm shall come to any business interest as a result of the administrative policy so long as I am President. I intend to surround myself with the best and broadest minds in the party, and then bend all my energies toward making an Administration that shall at least assure every element that the transfer of the Executive control from one party to another does not mean any serious disturbance of existing conditions. It is almost incredible to me that there should be any feeling of uncertainty whatever as to the future so far as the result of the election is concerned. Those who are to succeed to power by the will of their people are as much interested in the future of the United States as those who yield it. They also have an equal stake in the prosperity and advancement of the country. They are as thoroughly committed to the maintanance of values and as earnestly anxious for sterling business prosperity at their opponents. Naturally they will be careful about pronouncing for a policy inimical to the interests of the very class, which than any other, has thus honoured us with its confidence. Coming into power after so long an absence the party ought and will, so far as the Executive is concerned, bring liberal views and good impulses into the control of the Government. It would be unnatural for a party not to be actuated by a desire to continue in power by demonstrating that it deserved the higher confidence of the business and make factious war upon well conceived plans of government. This is the view I take of the proper position for a party just assuming control of a country in a crisis like this, and the standard by which I shall be guided while in the Presidential office. If I follow it I hope for and expect a fair and honest response from Republicans with whom I may have relations, as well as the hearty support of my own party. I feel of course that I have great responsibilities, and approach them with feelings of more or less anxiety."

Dundalk.

From our own correspondent.

The mixed train going north ran though the open switch on Monday disabling the tender and delaying both the mixed, and the mail trains for two or three hours.

Rev. Mr. Kerr, who travelled the old Artemesia circuit when Markdale, Flesherton, and Dundalk circuits were all in one, about twenty six years ago, conducted Divine service here in the Methodist church last Sabbath, morning and evening.

The ratepayers choose another school site on Monday last, and though three seperate polls have been held on the question it is quite possible there may be another. The question of new buildings is not discussed at all now, the necessity being admitted by even the chronic growlers. The site has been for some time the "all important" matter.

Mr. McMillan of Meaford will address an audience in the Methodist church on the Scott Act. When the campaign begins in good earnest, it is likely to be lively here.

Mr. Connor, late of Caledon, purchaser of the Davidson property, has arrived and erected a blacksmith shop prior to commencing business in that line.

Mrs. Kirvan and family formerly of Markdale, remove to Meaford this week.

We notice by posters that you have a live lodge of R. T's. What are our's doing I wonder.

Municipal matters very, very, quiet.

Flesherton.

From our own corresgondent.

FAREWELL GREETING. — On Wednesday evening, the 19th inst., a goodly number of the residents of Flesherton and vicinity assembled at the house of J. E. Moore, Esq., for the purpose of offering the Rev. Mr. McGregor, on the eve of his departure from this place, some token of respect and esteem. After some time had been spent in pleasant social conversation, and all had partaken of the good things provided by the ladies, Mr. C. Threadgold stated the object of the gathering, and presented Rev. Mr. McGregor with a very appropriate and kindly worded address, accompanied with a valuable silver watch, to which Mr. McGregor made a very suitable reply. After a very pleasant evening, the company separated.

ANNIVERSARY SERVICES.—Quite a disappointment occurred to the officers and members of the Methodist church in connection with their anniversary services here on Sunday and Monday last, by the Rev. Dr. Harper of Collingwood, who was announced to be present on Sabbath, and lecture the Monday evening following, not filling his engagement here. However, on the Sabbath morning Rev. Mr. McDowell occupied the pulpit, and in the evening the Rev. Wesley Casson of Markdale was present and gave a very eloquent, thoughtful and heart searching discourse upon the temptations by the Devil on the Saviour. The roads were bad; the weather very inclement, consequently the congregations were much smaller than usual. On Monday evening the tea provided by the ladies was all that heart could desire, but owing to the severe cold and blinding snowstorm the assembly of people was small, and it could not be wondered at that the expected speaker of the evening, Rev. Mr. Casson, was not present. After tea the company still remained in the basement of the church, and out of those present, a programme was made up of music, recitations and maiden speeches. Some choice selections were rendered by the choir. Song by Miss Christoe, also song by Mr. C. Sproule; recitation by Joseph Blackburn; pithy addresses by Mr. W. G. Pickell, M. Richardson and Rev. Mr. McDowell, which, on the whole, made a very pleasant and enjoyable evening's entertainment. As there was an abundance of provisions untouched, a social will be held in the basement of the church on Friday evening.

Rev. Mr. McIntyre of Knox College, Toronto, occupied the pulpit in the Presbyterian church here last Sabbath, much to the edification and pleasure of all who heard him.

Meaford Road.

From our own Correspondent.

The Rev. D. C. McDowell held sacremental services in the Wesley Church last Sabbath. There was a good attendance.

Death, on a pale horse, has paid another visit to this neighborhood; his victim this time was Arthur, second son of Mr. R. Shannon. His end was peace. The bereaved friends have the sympathy of the entire community.

Messrs. G. Warling and D. Walker are busy erecting an addition to Mrs. Foley's barn for a cow-stable and hay mow.

Mr. T. Clark has been canvassing this neighborhood with a petition in favour of Cook Teats death sentence being commuted to a term of years imprisonment.

Mr. R. Smith, Sr., has rented his farm to Mr. D. Thompson.

Mr. S. Coleman is round looking after the dimes on behalf of the municipal fathers.

Mr. John Cooey's bee house, like Mr. J. Brodie's substantial stone and cedar fence, is not completed yet. Perhaps he has also came in contact with a bull.

Correspondent No. 2 had better be on his guard, or he will have to wield something differen: to a grey goose quill.

DR. LOW'S PLEASANT WORM SYRUP.—An agreeable, safe and effectual remedy to remove all kinds of worms.

A Modern Dick Turpin.

(From the Owen Sound Advertiser.)

For a very long time past more than a score of persons in town have lost articles innumerable, and notwithstanding the watchful eye of the owners, the vigilence of the night-watchmen, and the long experience of Chief Egertion in such matters, the adroit thief went on his way rejoicing. Mystery of mysteries! Who could he be, and when could he do it? This is what everybody said, and echo answered "Who!" and "When!" Yet. still things disappeared. Blacksmith's portable forge, sewing machines, guns, arm-chairs, all sorts of tools, clothing from an undershirt to an overcoat, bales of cotton, boots, &c., &c. To be brief, everybody seemed to have lost everything. This was about the size of the affair up to last Saturday evening. It was then that somebody saw somebody in the vicinity of Mr. D. P. Urquhart's store making off with a pair of boots under somewhat suspicious circumstances. Mr. Urquhart just then discovered that two pairs of boots were missing, and immediately communicated with Chief Egerton, who followed up the trail and knocked boldly and asked for admission to the residence of one Thomas Leighton, a machinist, who lives on Scrope street. The Chief arrested Leighton, and, after duly cautioning him requested him to give up those boots. And the boots were produced! The Chief then proceeded to search the premises, and found, as he had expected, the clue to what had puzzled the brains of the people for so long a time. He then serched the premises and found a number of articles stowed away. After putting the prisoner in the Lock-up the Chief got a team and commenced the removal of the goods to the Police Office. Monday morning Leighton was arraigned at the Police Court for stealing two pairs of boots from Mr. Urquhart, elected to be tried by the P. M., and pleaded guilty. He was then remanded to gaol for one week, then to come up for his sentence. The Chief has already found twenty-one persons who have identified their property. The following is a list of the goods identified, but there is still several articles unclaimed as yet:

D. P. Urquhart, 2 pair of boots one do. overalls.

Wm. Wilson, two large arm chairs.

Robert Breckenridge, arm chair.

James Caton, arm chair.

Samuel Graham, 6 pair long leather boots; value $25.

Stephen Spencer, several dies a wheelbarrow and other blacksmith's tools; value $30.

Wm. McFinley drill machines &c., drills, sawing machine, several dies and other blacksmith's tools; value $50.

Thomas Christie, a portable forge, value $25.

Thomas Maidment, steel rule.

Joseph Ramsay several dies and a number of blacksmith's tools; value $25.

Messrs. Corbet & Sons, a large iron vice and center bit.

W. B. Stephens, several cans of paint, value $20.

Alexander Cameron, several carpenter's tools.

John B. Smith a large number of carpenter's tools.

Barn Burned.—Mr. Henry Boyce lost his seasons crop yesterday morning before daylight by the devouring element. The barn, which was a large frame, was filled with fine grain, the product of 50 acers. There was in the stable adjoining, a span of horses 6 cattle. 9 pigs, also hens and ordinary contents. The horses, cattle and pigs were saved by a desperate effort. The origin of the fire is a mystery, as Mr. B. had no lantern or light of any kind about the barn the evening previous. The fact of having found, one morning about two weeks since, a bottle of whiskey and several partly burned matches in the barn, leads Mr. Boyce to suspect tramps, who may yet be found in the ruins. Mr. Boyce's loss will not be less than $1,000, with $500 insurance. It is not known whether Mrs. Reid (who owned the barn) had it insured or not.

Markdale, Sept. 1, 1884. 190-tf

FOR THE FARMER.

Fall Feeding.

November is a trying month to farm stock in our northern climate. The tender grasses have been partially ruined by the first hard frosts, leaving just enough to coax the cattle and other stock away from their dry fodder, yet too scant to furnish a generous living, or to keep up the flow of milk for the dairy.

The poor dumb brutes are loath to leave the fields and pastures so long as there is a green blade to be nibbled, and they will even continue to haunt their favorite grazing grounds when only the yellow tufts of frost-bitten herbage remain to mark the place of their summer revels. Reason, instinct, experience, or something, seems to teach them that a long, hard winter is approaching, when they will have to forego their wholesome diet of green food, as is too often the case on the farm; and they seem to dread its arrival, and endeavor to protract the grazing period to the last possible hour.

This of itself should teach the farmer the needs of his stock, and induce him to provide for their wants by laying in a generous supply of green food to relieve the monotonous diet of dry hay and grain, which he has been long accustomed to deal out to them. It is a hard matter to break up old customs and practices that by long association have become fixed habits; yet when the farmer sees how closely it affects his interests, he should not long hesitate in working the greatly needed reform.

While the cattle may naturally desire to roam over the fields to the latest possible day, I do not think it policy to allow them to do so. More cattle are made unruly at this time of the year than at all other times put together. They find nothing satisfactory to feed upon, so roam uneasily about, reaching through the fences and bars, and trying the strength of every obstruction that comes in their way, in the form of wall or fence. The boldest of the lot will make a "break" and the rest of the herd are not slow to follow, thus taking their first lessons in fence breaking and pilfering.

Instead of allowing stock to wander about to pick up a precarious living during the late autumn months it is much better management to provide late cut forage plants which yield very heavily and can be cut and cured for this purpose, at very little expense. Those who have corn-fodder—and what farmer has not—can find no better time for using it than during these late months. If well cured it is always relished by stock, when hay would go untouched. This is particularly the case with the fodder obtained from sowed corn, which is cut and cured with regard to the forage rather than to the ripening of the grain.

To supplement this coarse food, and to furnish something to take the place of the green food they have lost, pumpkins, squashes, and such quick decaying roots as cannot be kept along into winter, should now be fed out. Immense crops of flat white turnips can be grown for this purpose after another crop has been taken from the ground. These are not long keepers, and can best be fed out in the fall. Pumpkins are excellent, while squashes cannot be surpassed as feed for milch cows in fall and winter. All the roots are good—potatoes, ruta bagas, carrots beets, wurtzels, etc.

Stock fed liberally with the above mentioned articles will not fail in flesh or milk, as is the case with those that are allowed, or forced, to pick up a living from the fields. When so fed they should be kept in large yards where they will have plenty of room for exercise, but still not enough to cause them to run their flesh off in exploring them.

As soon as the frosty nights come, the stock should be housed, as well as fed, regularly. Stock cannot do the best when they get up in the open yard covered with frost and thoroughly chilled through each morning. I know that it is customary among a large class to allow them to lie out in the yards until heavy freezing or perhaps snow comes; but the fact does not make it any better for the stock, or the practice profitable to the owners. An animal well-housed does not require as much food to keep it up in good condition, as the one that is exposed to all sorts of weather, day and night. If the readers of this article have ever seen cattle fed in the yard on a cold, frosty morning, they will agree with me that such voracious appetites require at least a third more fodder to satisfy them. As the cattle when so exposed do not thrive as well as those that are housed and fed much less, it is quite plain that the extra feed is wasted, to say nothing of the injury done the stock.

Nor should stock be allowed to run over the grass lands late in autumn, on account of the injury resulting to the next year's crop of grass in consequence of close picking, and hard treading. Grass roots need mulching in this climate, and the only practical method of furnishing this mulch, is to allow a portion of the growth to serve in this capacity. It is not that a light growth of dry grass will keep the frost from the roots, but it assists in retaining the snow evenly on the surface, which prevents the alternate freezing and thawing, so fatal to the roots of grasses and grains.

I am satisfied that yard and stable feeding is by far the most economical system of feeding at all times of the year. Good farm managers are resorting to the soiling system, and nearly all agree that the capabilities of an acre are much increased by this method of feeding. As our farms grow smaller, as they eventually must, in consequence of divisions of family estates and increase of population, this method will become more generally adopted. There is certainly no other time in all the year when yard and stable feeding can be more advantageous to the farmer than during the autumn season.

Coarse fodder that could not be stored in the barn, should now be fed out before it suffers any further injury from rains and snows. If fed in the stable it will usually pay to cut it up fine and mix a little ground feed with the mass. Above all things the stock should not be denied a fair portion of green food, such as we have mentioned above. A sudden change of diet from green to dry food is always sure to cause a falling off in the condition of the stock.—[Western Plowman.

Work in the Garden.

November is a good month to plan out the garden for next year. It may seem a working a good ways ahead, yet if this work is done this fall it will save considerable time in the spring. Then if you have no asparagus bed, or rhubarb, you can procure the sets this fall and make a start; or, if you have sown seed in the spring, now is the best time to transplant.

In planning out the garden, first decide to use a garden plow and drill in planting and cultivating, and in order to do this to the best advantage plant in long rows.

My plan of a garden is to reserve one side for a number of rows for asparagus, rhubarb, sage, savory, horse radish, mustard, spinach, chicory, saffron and horehound. They are al convenient. More might be added, but I find the ones enumerated sufficient for ordinary purposes.

The asparagus bed, or rows, come first, then the rhubarb, because they require nearly the same treatment, and by planting them close together I save some trouble in mulching in the fall. Then the sage, savory and saffron follow next, and then the horehound. This places the medical and seasoning plants together. Then the chicory, spinach, mustard and horse radish, these are principally for greens. By having these all on one side there is no need for disturbing them when plowing up the garden in fall; part of them do not necessarily require extra manuring, and I find this plan economizes manure, while the others require extra heavy manuring in order to secure the best results, and this can be given without wasting. The plants can all be set out better in the fall than in the spring, while the seed of the mustard and spinach can be sown as well in the fall as in the spring and will come into use much earlier than if the work is delayed until spring.

In plowing up the balance of the garden see that the furrows are left open so that the water will drain off easily and rapidly. A good dressing of well rotted manure will be beneficial. Remember that it is extremely difficult to get the garden too rich. Yet it is not desirable to haul out fresh manure that is full of weed and grass seeds in the garden. It will pay better to pile up and rot well and then work as fine as possible before applying.

A little time spent now in preparing a supply of pea brushes, or sticks, and bean poles ready for use, will save considerable time in the spring when work is pressing.

Then it is a good plan to prepare a number of small round stakes, flatten one side and paint white so they can be written upon. They are very convenient for marking the places where the different varieties of plants are sown; store them away where they will dry. See that all the tools are under a good cover, well cleaned up and oiled so that they will not rust.

"Fat in December, strong in March," is a maxim that should be painted in large letters over the door of every sheep-house. The practice is altogether too common of letting sheep run on the pastures without extra food till the snow gets so deep that they can no longer secure a scanty living. The first heavy freeze so injures the grass that it has but little nutritive value, and unless additional food is given the sheep will begin to lose flesh; and if compelled to live on what they pick, will get quite thin before severe cold weather. This is about the most foolish thing the farmer can do, for when they are once in this condition, it is very hard to arrest the downward course. It is the result of this unwise practice that causes the great loss among the flocks toward spring, particularly among the younger sheep, which is so often attributed to "grub in the head." Every sheep-keeper should have the facilities, and on the approach of hard freezes should commence to feed daily a little hay or grain. The necessary outlay will be money well invested.

Precious Stones in America

A beautiful diamond that was cut into a remarkably fine stone has lately been found near San Francisco, and at a jeweler's in Indianapolis there are two crystals of this precious gem on exhibition which were found in Indiana. Within the past year a diamond is reported to have been found in Missouri by a hunter, who picked it out of a brook where he stopped to drink. Experienced geologists held to the opinion that so many of the associations of the diamond are present in North Carolina that they have hopes of their being found there. The garnet districts of Arizona and New Mexico may also be looked upon as the probable diamond mines of the future. Sapphires and rubies have been found at Vernon, N. J., and in Franklin, Macon County, N. C. The colors are rich blue, violet blue, ruby red and yellow, while some are colourless. The principal locality for sapphires in the United States, however, is in the gravel districts near Helena, Mon., and Santa Fe, N. M. Here they occur in the sand, associated with poridol and pyrope-garnet. No regular searching for them is carried on. They are often found with the associated gems on ant hills, which abound in that district.

A Horse Problem.

Color in regard to constitution is a problem which some casual students of horse-breeding are trying to solve. As usual in such cases, when the information vouchsafed by those who are in the position of knowing something is not submitted to the test of cross examination, it is not reliable. For a long time all those who have been engaged in working horses have been of the opinion that brown horses lasted the longest, and were the best to withstand wear and tear. Bays and blacks were next fancied, then came the animals of lighter shades of color. We have no good reasons for believing this, however, for any single opinion on the subject expressed without reasons or facts, is not reliable enough. We have known the oldest horses—horses that have done the hardest work in the centre of a Clydesdale district, where chestnut is despised—to be pure chestnuts, and the best and oldest horse of the opposition firm almost next door to be a pure black. There is danger, therefore, we say, in raising discussions on this subject without material. In fact some horsemen are color blind to all but bays and browns.—[London Live Stock Journal.

The knowledge of courtesy and good manners is a very necessary study. It is like grace and beauty, that which begets liking and an inclination to love one another at the first sight, and in the beginning of an acquaintance a familiarity; and consequently, that which first opens the door, and introduces us to better ourselves by the examples of others if there be anything in the society worth taking notice of.

A FORTUNE IN CLIPPINGS.

A Yankee's Quick Jump from No Thing to a Big Thing—New Way of Utilizing Newspapers.

About two years ago a young man of Russian descent and Cincinnati birth was standing one morning on a Parisian boulevard, wondering whatever was to become of him. He had only two francs in his pocket and had already tried in vain every means he could think of for getting a living. While he was contemplating the black prospect before him a gentleman stepped up to a newspaper kiosk close by, received a copy of a paper costing two sous, laid down a franc in payment, and walked away. It was not for nothing that this young man had been born in America, since to witness this mysterious transaction was to him the same thing as to realize that there was place and fortune for the middle man between the two parties to it. The explanation, as he learned afterward, was that the gentleman was an artist, that the old woman carefully searched each morning's papers for any remarks upon his pictures, and that when she found one he gave her a franc for the paper containing it. What the apple was to Newton or the deer's skull to Geoffroy Saint Hilaire, this monetary spectacle on the boulevard was to Henry Romeike; in so far, at any rate, as it pointed the way to fame. He managed to get to London, invested his last penny in a copy of the Daily Telegraph during the picture season, cut out the notices of artists' works, and positively peddled them from studio to studio. The next day he was in a position to buy several papers, and the next week a large number, and to extend his operations to other persons than artists. At the present moment, so accurate was his idee mere, and so skillfully has he followed it up, that his handful of newspaper snippings has become nothing less than "The Artistic and Literary Correspondence and Universal Compendium of the Press," with offices where a score of clerks, male and female, are busily engaged all day long in cutting up great heaps of newspapers, pasting the cuttings upon printed forms, and mailing them literally to all parts of the world.

Three thousand English newspapers, 600 American ones, and several hundred published on the European continent are thus regularly searched through and dismembered under the direction of this ingenious American. The papers as they come in are examined by Romeike himself or one of his head clerks (French, German, Italian, and Russian are read in the office), passages referring to any person or subject on the books of the bureau are marked, numbered, and a printed slip correspondingly numbered and having blank spaces for the date, name, and address of the newspaper, and name of the subscriber, is placed between the leaves, and finally the paper is handed to the boys or girls, who cut out the passages, stick them on the slips, enter them in a book, and mail them. The charge made for 100 notices—"To see ourselves as others see us," on any matter whatever—is $5, or $20 for 500. From its humble beginnings, the "Artistic and Literary Correspondence" has grown into an institution of recognized merit and importance. Among its 7 000 subscribers are a majority of the members of Parliament, numbers of actors, artists, novelists, poets, institutions, and every person who makes a hobby of any public matter. When Lord Dufferin was appointed Viceroy of India, he telegraphed to Romeike from Constantinople to forward him all allusions to India. Lord Randolph Churchill was provided with 8 000 cuttings about himself in eight months. Barnum received 1 000 notices of his white elephant in three days; Mr. Chamberlain has been supplied with opinions concerning the shipping legislation, and Lord Derby concerning New Guinea; the Irish members have a standing order for cuttings upon which troublesome questions to her Majesty's ministers may be founded. Not a few persons are actuated by the same motive as the lady (not the major's wife) who writes for all allusions to Major ——— of the ———th, now serving in Egypt, and Oscar Wilde, it need hardly be added in conclusion, has been a patron of the enterprise from the first.

Concerning Finger Rings.

While there is a touch of barbarism, in wearing rings on the fingers, yet the civilized hand has so long been adorned by them that it would look plain and unfinished without its hoops of gold. The ancient Romans wore the ring on the joint just under the nail. The Hebrews wore it on the right hand alone. The Greeks wore their rings on the fourth finger of the left hand the Gauls and Britons on the third finger of the left hand. In Pliny's time the bethrothal ring was an iron hoop, set with a loadstone instead of a gem. The Romans were even greater slaves to fashion than we of the present. They had winter and summer rings, the weight and color of the ring being adapted to the season. The Greeks wore week ly rings, which were charms, and were always italglios and cameos. Talismanic rings were also in use among the Romans. Seal rings were heirlooms and of great value in business transactions. The wedding ring is of great antiquity. It is a common thing to find wives who have been married a lifetime, yet never had allowed the wedding-ring to slip over the finger-joint. It is considered unlucky to take it off To lose it indicates a misfortune.

As your wedding ring wears
So wear away your cares."

A Duchess's Narrow Escape.

Duchess Thyra of Cumberland, sister of the Empress of Russia and of the Princess of Wales, has just escaped, in an almost miraculous manner, an accident of the chase. Two days ago this young princess was hunting a stag in company with her husband and several other members of the illustrious colony of princes established on the shores of Lake Gmarden. Just as she was crossing on horseback the waterfall of Aurach, the little bridge gave way and the noble huntress was precipated into the stream. The fall was the more unfortunate as the horse rolled over the princess. However, her Royal Highness received only a few slight bruises which did not even prevent her from mounting into the saddle again as soon as she was drawn out of the water.

HUNGRY JIM'S STORY.

The Details of a Romantic Tragedy Told Before the Pine-Knot Fire of a Sierra Shakemaker.

Living just above the foothills and in the midst of the virgin pine forests of the Sierras are a class of industrious people little known to the world, writes a correspondent. They live an isolated happy life far from the busy world, of which they know little and care less. These are the "shakemakers." They exist usually in couples, and make their home for the time being where the finest sugar-pine grows, and whence the products of their labor can be conveniently hauled away. They are a jolly, happy lot, these "shakemakers" of the Sierras. They work at will, and by way of recreation divide their leisure time between deer and bear-hunting and the nearest country store The mode of making "shakes" or clapboards is simple. The tree felled is sawed into suitable lengths, and then is split into thin boards or "shakes" by means of a froe and a mallet. The shakes sell here in the mountains at $4 to $4.50 per thousand, and are always in demand. A shakemakers' camp is one of the most picturesque scenes to be found on the coast and the voluntary recluses who spend year after year in these mountain solitudes are the jolliest lot of bachelors on earth. A majority of this almost unknown race of men are old miners and young men from the foothill farms. Wild, brave, uneducated, and kind-hearted, they include within their numbers hundreds of the best frontiersmen and the noblest types of manhood. While rambling among this hospitable class of men one evening, I suddenly came into a clearing upon the mountain side, in the centre of which stood a log cabin of the most primitive character, upon the porch of which stood a smiling old man; who ventured the information, "This is 'Hungry Jim's' place." Before I could reply to this startling and incomprehensible announcement the old man added the following explanation:

"The shakemakers call me 'Hungry Jim' just for fun; not that I don't have enough to eat, for if you stop at my place to-night, as I hope you will, you will find Hungry Jim a good feeder."

And so it proved, for Jim is a good cook, a hospitable host, and one of the best story-tellers extant. His name is Miguel Elias, and he is a native of Tucson, but he has spent thirty-fiveyears among the mountains. He is one of those interesting characters who live in the past, and never tire of telling of the days of '49, when gold was being taken out of these gulches in chunks and every man was wealthy who would work. "Jim" had seen the day when he could count his wealth by thousands, but monte and bad luck has made him poor, but happier than ever before. His life is a romance and a woman the cause of his financial ruin. Now he keeps a rendezvous for the Calaveras and Tuolumne shakemakers. It was "Jim" seated before a cheerful pine knot fire which glowed brilliantly that keen frosty evening, who related the following interesting details of a recent tragedy and romance. The telegraph told a meagre story of the crime, which was committed last fourth of July, but the romantic part of the affair remained untold. "Said Jim: "Did you notice a toll gate down the mountain? A nice little white cottage near the bank of a creek? Yes? There is where my old mining pard, Frank Pareta, lived, and there in that creek is where he drowned his wife. Oh, she was a beauty, was Frank's wife. The handsomest Italian girl I ever saw. Frank went all the way to Italy to find and marry her, and now he has killed her. This is how it came about Frank Pareta and I were working together several years in the mines down there in Angels camp, and one day Frank said to me, 'Miguel, I am going to get married when I get money enough to buy that toll road at Murphy's. I laughed at him, and thought no more about it, as women were scarce about Angels, and Frank never mixed with them. But he saved all of his money, and in due time left the cabin and went to Italy. In a few months he astonished the camp by returning with a young girl wife, the handsomest woman we had ever seen. Frank was very proud of his prize and fairly worshiped her. He bought her everything she desired, dressed her gayly, decked her in jewellery, and kept a girl to wait on her. He bought her the toll road for $4 000 and built that pretty little cottage you see there. But the girl was not satisfied. She tired of her elderly husband, and looked with loving glances upon younger admirers. The husband was jealous, but he was kind and patient. She was capricious and abusive, but Frank lived on in hopes of happier times. The toll-gate keeper had about $1,200 buried in his cellar, and this hidden treasure he revealed to his pretty Italian wife, who secretly appropriated $500 and with it went to San Andreas, the county-seat, and applied for a divorce. Frank heard of the divorce business, but did not discover the loss of his $500 until the morning of last Fourth of July. There was a celebration at Murphy's camp, and Frank staid at home to collect tolls. He went down to the cellar and discovered the loss of the $500 He called his wife and accused her of the theft. At first she denied, but finally acknowledged that she had taken it, and defiantly announced that she intended to use it to obtain a divorce, and positively declined to give it up. Then the angry husband went out and walked up and down in front of the house. Then he went and gazed into the foaming mountain stream, which was swollen and deep. Then he went to the house and quietly and calmly invited his wife to take a little walk with him. She consented. The servant girl protested and warned the wife that her husband intended to kill her. The man and wife walked to the creek. There seized her by the throat, and, after furtively strangling her, threw her body into the stream to see her drown. An old German living near witnessed the struggle and ran to the wife's assistance. He drew the half-drowned woman out of the water. The husband seized her again and plunged her plunged her once more into the torrent. The old German once more dragged the inanimate woman to the shore. Again the brutal husband threw her into the water and she floated down stream from whence the old German pulled her lifeless form. When taken to the house the missing $500 and $150 more money was sewed in her corset. She died with her coin."

"And what became of the murderer?"

'He is in the county jail at San Andreas awaiting trial. He is as happy as a prince and sings merrily every day. Of course he will hang, and everybody in these regions will say, 'Well served.'"

A LADY'S PLUCKY FIGHT.

Shooting and Perhaps Mortally Wounding a Negro Assailant.

Mrs. L. A Cooley, of Atlanta, Ga., is alone much of the night owing to her husband's absence at his mill. She had bolted the doors and windows of her house at 9 o'clock for the purpose of retiring when a rapping on the door attracted her attention. Asking "Who's that?" the answer came in a man's voice

"It's me. I've dropped something out here; give me a match."

"I'll shoot you if you don't leave here instantly," the lady replied.

She heard the man retreat and pass out of the gate. Going to her bureau she loaded her husband's revolver and laying it on a shelf beside her bed retired. During the night she was awakened by a noise at the door, and thinking her husband had come she started to open it. All recollection of the man who had knocked at the door earlier in the night was for the moment forgotten. On opening the door a hand black as the ace of spades was quickly thrust in, and before Mrs Cooley could realise her danger a negro had his arms about her and was bearing her back into the room. As the negro raised her from the floor her hand came in contact with the shelf on which she had laid her pistol, and she grasped it. Unluckily it was her left hand with which she seized the weapon, but as the negro strode further into the house she cocked the pistol and placing the muzzle close to the negro's neck pulled the trigger. A loud report followed and with a groan the negro released his hold upon Mrs Cooley and dropped to the floor. Mrs. Cooley also fell but instantly regained her feet, and changing the pistol from her left hand to her right, she again cocked and presented it at the negro, fully determined to kill him. The negro who was already wounded and bleeding, begged for his life. Mrs. Cooley pulled the trigger, but the hammer would not respond. She laid all her force upon it, but it would not go.

The negro was quick to see that something was wrong and, rising, staggered towards the door. Just as he disappeared through the doorway Mrs. Cooley discovered that her pistol was but half-cocked. The hammer was given another pull, and, as the negro sprang through the yard gate Mrs Cooley sent a ball flying after him. Again he dropped, but almost immediately was upon his feet again, racing towards the woods.

The encounter drove the sleep from Mrs. Cooley's eyes for the rest of the night and until her husband came home she sat beside the fire with the pistol in her lap.

Mrs. Cooley is satitfied that she mortally wounded her assailant. The police are scouring the country for him, but it is most likely he will be found dead in the woods.

THE ALASKA SEALS.

Preparing the Skins for Market—A Mystery in Natural History.

Few of those wearing a sealskin sacque have any knowledge of the process by which the skins are prepared for use. Seen when first taken from the animal they little resemble the warm glossy skins worn upon our streets, for until dyed and cured they are of a light-brown hue, coarse and full of sand. Before becoming valuable they are shaved down on the flesh side until not thicker than paper, the long hairs are pulled out and the fur dyed. The cost of the article is due to the labor expended on it. The raw skins are sold in London, where the finishing is done, and then shipped back to America, where they are sold with a heavy duty added. The killing season in Alaska begins about the 12th of June and the 100,000 skins are usually ready for shipment a month later. The work of slaughtering the animals is done by natives who live upon the St. Paul and St. George islands and the process is an interesting one. When skins are wanted the natives go to the rookeries, station themselves along the shore between the seals and the water, and at a given signal spring to their feet and make as much noise as possible. The frightened victims, timid as deer, then stampede up the beach and are driven like sheep a few miles inland, until their captors, attack them with hickory clubs. Being knocked senseless, they are stabbed with long sharp knives and the skins are quickly stripped from the bodies, The work is divided among the men, some knocking the seals down, others stabbing them and still others taking off the skins. The native Indians numbers about three hundred and under the terms of the lease, are provided gratis by the company with warm houses, sixty tons of coal, a doctor and a schoolmaster, salmon and other necessities and comforts. For their labor the men are paid some $40 000 altogether each season, a sum more than sufficient to meet the limited needs of life in a region of almost perpetual fogs and utter isolation.

After the killing season is over the seals begin to shed their hair and a few weeks later disappear from the summer camping-grounds for parts unknown. The males leave first and the females and young seals later, until by November the islands are utterly deserted. Where the fur seal spends his winter is a question that has never yet been settled. The fact that he goes away in November and returns in May is all that can be learned of him. Some have supposed that the animals btake themselves to undiscovered islands further south, where they remain during the winter season, but still none of the many seekers have been able to find these places. The seal is not a water animal in the true sense of the word. He cannot remain long under water, is not an expert swimmer, and yet he leaves St. Paul for months and returns there thin and scrawny. Where is the time passed? If somebody could tell, that person would have information worth a fortune. They go away in sections and are scattering in their return, yet they select every year the old feeding and breeding stations, and are found nowhere except upon the two rocky islands of St. George and St. Paul. Here is a simple fact, yet one of inestimable value to Alaska. Sail to the seal islands in July, notice the countless number of animals there, realize the price which the skins command, the constant demands of the market, and Alaska will appear in a new light; It will look to be worth the money that it cost us.

To quarrel with a superior is injurious; with an equal is doubtful; with an inferior, sordid and base; with any, full of unquietness.

A Chinaman's Strange Attachment.

In Alaska street, on the corner of a narrow alley below Sixth, there is a dingy laundry, with the name of "Wah Kee" painted in flaming letters on a crazy sign above the door. This is where Wah Kee lives and works and spends his lonely life.

The house across the alley is just as old, and the roof is just as crazy, and the folks that live there are just as poor and lonely as poor Wah.

That's where Tot lived. Everybody knew Tot. Tot's clothes were old, and Tot's face was wan, but somehow the soul of the little one crept into the heart of the lonely Chinaman, and Wah Kee's eyes beamed as they never beamed before.

So he would stand by the door and look across the alley at Tot and smile—and Tot would patter across the little ocean of dirt and water, and clasping her chubby hand around Wah Kee's legs, look up in his face and coo.

Tot's folks chided the little one—for they hated the sight of "the haythen," as they called Tot's friend.

One day Tot stayed away and Wah Kee looked in vain for the baby. Another day passed and then Wah Kee's face grew sad and his heart heavy, and he shambled across the narrow alley and begged Tot's folks to tell him where Tot was.

They told him she was sick, that it would be many days before Tot would be about again.

So Wah went back to his dingy shop and rolled up his sleeves and went to work again, but his head was heavy and his heart was across the alley in the little house where Tot lay ill

One day Wah Kee looked over the way to the little house and his heart gave a great leap, for there, pressed against the window was the face of wee Tot—white and wan, but smiling. And Wah Kee dropped his iron and ran across the pavement and stood by the window.

Tot's voice was weak and Tot might not have the window up, for it was cold and damp, but Wah Kee stood outside and talked in pantomime and Tot, punching her fists against the murky pane, laughed with glee.

So every day Tot was propped up in the window and Wah Kee stood in the shop and looked at the little face and sighed.

Sometimes when Wah Kee's countrymen came to see him they laughed, and Hop Long and Lee Yeo and Wong Sing Lung chided him for the strange love he bore the baby, but Wah Kee only shook his head and answered:

"Wah Kee has no one else. Tot is Wah Kee's baby."

But Tot died, and yesterday they buried her. There were only two carriages—there was one for Tot and the father and mother of the dead baby—and Wah had a carriage, and all alone, in the silence of the tight-closed cab, he rode and grieved for the sunny face and the prattling nonsense of the child he had worshipped with all the devotion of his pagan faith.

They buried her at Fernwood in a little grave in a little plot almost as small, and Wah Kee stood by the grave and cried, and the great tears streamed down his face, and, dropping upon the grave, he kissed the place where Tot—or all that was left of her—slept in silence.—[Philadelphia News.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

The Struggle Between a Man and a Panther.

A Bombay shikaree narrates how he once actually fell into the claws of a panther, and lived to tell the tale. After describing the incidents of the hunt up to the time when the beast broke cover, he says:

"I had to wait until the panther was within a few feet of me, and then I put my rifle down to his head, expecting to roll him over like a rabbit (as I had succeeded in doing on other occasions), and then place my second bullet pretty much where I pleased. To my horror, there was no report when the hammer fell. The next moment the panther, with an angry roar, sprang upon me. Hanging on with the claws of one fore-paw driven into my right shoulder and the other round me, he tried to get at my head and neck, but I fortunately prevented this by raising my left arm, which he instantly seized in his huge mouth. I shall never forget his sharp angry roar, the wicked look of his greenish yellow eyes within six inches of mine, the turned back ears, his fetid breath upon my cheek, and the feeling of his huge fangs closing to the bone through my arm above the elbow.

"I endeavored, by giving him my knee in the stomach, to make him let go. Those who have ever kicked a cat can imagine what little effect this had. It was more like using one's knee to a football than anything else. The panther, with a roar, gave a tremendous wrench to my arm, hurled me some five paces down the side of the hill prone on my face, bringing my head in contact with a tree. Stunned and insensible, a lay some seconds on the ground, and the brute, thinking me dead, fortunately did not worry me, but, passing over me, went for the retreating police constable who had brought me into the difficulty. I remember, when I came to, raising my head from the ground, leaning my head against the tree, and smiling with a certain feeling of grim satisfaction, when my eye caught the retreating form of the constable and the pursuing panther down the hill, and I thought the policeman's turn had come.

"The civil surgeon of the station probed the teeth-wounds in the arm, and found that the one at the back of the arm ran right to the bone and was an inch and a half deep. The two wounds on the inner side, in or close to the biceps, were, one an inch and a quarter and the other an inch deep. The claw-wounds on the right shoulder were not serious, and had fortunately just missed the large artery near the collar-bone, injury to which would have resulted in my bleeding to death in a very few minutes."—[The Times of India.

A DRY TIME.

When the Earth Drinks up Her Oceans.

Prof. Cookley, of New York, says: Most of the planets have probably cooled down by radiation to a solid under crust like the earth. The sun owing to his greater mass is still a fiery globe not yet cooled down so as to have a solid crust. But our moon being a body of small mass only about one-eightieth of the earth's mass, is supposed to have had time to cool down to a solid globe all the way from its surface to its centre. Its internal heat is supposed to have been all radiated away into the surrounding cold space. Now the hot interior mass of the earth can, of course, contain no water, and little or none of the free gases that constitute an atmosphere. They would be boiled off, expanded and driven to the surface where are found now the great bulk of our oceans and our atmosphere. But when the earth shall have parted with all its internal heat, having thrown it into the surrounding cold space as the moon has done, then the cold, solid but porous mass within its present crust, which is now incapable of absorbing water or air, on account of the present high temperature, will begin to drink up the water and air just as the parched soil after a summer's drought drinks up the rain, and the ground is dry in a few minutes after the shower. But you may well ask, could the solid porous mass within the present crust of the earth thus drink up the whole of the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and canse all the waters of our globe to disappear? Let us examine this more closely.

While the interior of the earth remains as hot as it is at present it is no more possible for the water and air of our globe to penetrate to these fiery regions than it is for a drop of water to remain on a hot stone. But the earth is losing its heat day by day and year by year, radiating it out into the surrounding cold space. I know it has been computed that the earth receives from the sun annually just as much heat as it loses in a year by radiation into the surrounding space. Grant that it may be so for the present and for many thousand years to come. But the trouble is that the sun himself is cooling off and, therefore will not be always able to send us as much heat as he does at present. The time will, therefore, surely come when we shall lose more heat by radiation into space than the sun will be able to return to us. Then it will only be a question of time for the earth gradually to cool down, as the moon has already done, from surface to centre. When that time comes will not the dry but solid and porous core of our globe drink up the oceans and atmosphere, causing them to disappear, not into large cavernous pockets but into the minute pores of its substance?

The proposition appears to be established by strict calculation that the interior of the earth when cold will be able to absorb more than four times, possibly more than thirty times, the amount of water now on its surface. Now, it seems certain that in the manner first explained the earth will continue to lose both its superficial water and its atmosphere The earth, the other planets, and even the sun himself, are regarded as doomed at some future day to the same fate. Melancholy fate, some will say. But why complain of the general law of nature? Everything in nature has its morning of life, its high meridian of glory and strength, its evening decline and its midnight of blackness and death. Is the case of a world—is that the last term of a series?

The World's Telegraphs.

Canada has been represented to be a "slow-going" country. We don't believe it. In the matter of great internal improvements, she stands first among the countries of the world, regard being had to population. In railways she has gone ahead with wonderful rapidity, and in canals she is not wanting, and in telegraphic lines she is as prominent as she is in railways. A recent report of the Public Works Department points out that our telegraphic accomodation is greater than either that of the United States or any European country. The number of offices in Canada is 2,259, or 1 to 1,914 of population, as based on the census of 1881. In the Scientific American it is stated that the number of American telegraph offices in 1882 was 12,917, and the number of telegrams forwarded during the year was 40,581,177. The number of telegraph offices in Great Britain and Ireland in 1882 was 5,747, the number of telegrams forwarded being, 32,965,029. Germany has 10,803 offices, the number of telegrams forwarded being 26,260,124. Russia had 2,819, the number of telegrams forwarded being 9,800,201. Belgium had 835 offices, the number of telegrams forwarded being 4,066,843. Spain had 647 offices, the number of telegrams forwarded being 2,830,186. British India had 1,025 offices the number of telegrams forwarded being 2,032,605. Switzerland had 1,160 offices, Italy 2,590, and Austria 2,696. The number of telegrams forwarded in the last three countries mentioned was 3,040,182, 7,026,387, and 6,626,203, respectively. It will be seen by these figures, having regard to population, that Canada stands A No. 1, while she stands only third or fourth among the nations in the absolute magnitude of her commerce. To say, under these circumstances, that Canada is a "slow-going" country, is to pronounce upon her an unmitigated libel.—[Brantford Telegram, Oct. 31.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

No woman is educated who is not equal to the successful management of a family.

The administration of government, like a guardianship, ought to be directed to the good of those who confer, and not to those who receive the trust.

I know no such thing as genius; genius is nothing but labor and diligence.

The ignorant man hath no greater foe than his own ignorance, for it destroyeth where it liveth.

The key of fate is in our own hands; we often unlock it and then throw the key away.

Many people take no care of their money till they have come nearly to the end of it, and others do the same with their time.

The whole of human virtue may be reduced to speaking the truth always, and doing good to others.

Moon-Blindness.

Moon blindness seems to be the explanation vouchsafed by a British Rear Admiral to account for the loss of the gunboat Wasp and the imminent danger of the Trident. This affection is supposed to cause its victims to grope as if in the dark in bright moonlight and to mistake the gleam in a lighthouse for moonshine. One British writer who objects to this notion says he has known moon-blind men to be effectually cured by the punishment of extra duty; and it is really worth while inquiring whether the modern eagerness to theorize in some unexpected way about disasters on land and sea, does not tend to shelter under scientific speculations simple carelessness and gross betrayal of trust.

What 10 cents Will do.

A 10 cent bottle of Polson's Nerviline will cure neuralgia or headache. A 10 cent bottle of Nerviline will cure toothache and faceache. A 10 cent sample bottle of Nerviline is sufficient to cure colds, diarrhœa, spasms, dysentery, &c. Nerviline is just the thing to cure all pains, whether internal or external. Buy at your druggist a ten cent sample of Nerviline, "the great pain cure." Safe, prompt, and always effectual. Large bottles at any drug store, only 25 cents.

How They Do it.

So called respectable people would hesitate considerable before pilfering your pockets in a crowded thoroughfare. That would be too too. The same discrimination is not indicated by the so-called respectable druggist when that wonderful corn cure, PUTNAM'S PAINLESS CORN EXTRACTOR, is asked for. He will pilfer your pockets in the most genteel manner by substituting cheap and dangerous substitutes for the genuine Putnam's Corn Extractor. Watch for these gentlemen, and take none other than Putnam's Corn Extractor. Sold by druggists everywhere. N. C Polson & Co., Kingston, proprs.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure. the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star

THE BENEFIT OF NEWSPAPERS.—The country newspaper is the most useful and least compensated of all the agencies which stamp the impress of progress upon villages and inland towns. Without the aid of local newspapers, local towns are, as a rule, thriftless and dead. It is common for some great man to speak with contempt of the local newspapers, but the village newspaper makes more great men out of less material—more bricks without straw—than any other factor in politics, and it is the one ladder on which men climb to local distinction as the beginning of wide fame. The advent of the local newspaper has always dated the increased thrift of the community. The local newspaper is the life of the locality, and the measure of its support as a rule measures the advancement of the people. Not only subscribe but pay for your local newspapers. They are friends and helpmates in all seasons.

NOT AN INDUCEMENT.—When advertising a piece of property for sale, a shrewd real estate agent will mention among other advantages location, good schools are within easy reach, the churches of different denominations are within easy reach, and that though in a quiet and retired place, two minutes' walk takes you to a street car line leading into the heart of the city, etc. Did you never notice in this enumeration of inducements to buy, the fact that a first-class saloon was located on the opposite corner, or that on the next block was a free lunch counter, where the best beer it the city was always on drought, or a pool-room which would be so pleasant and handy for the boys?

No, indeed. While the church and the school an easy access to business are essential to the well-being and maintenance of the home, the others are in every sense antagonistic and inimical to everything that is reckoned dearest and most valued in that sacred place.—Ex.

Walters Falls.

From our own correspondent.

DEAR SIR,—Nothing very interesting has transpired here since I wrote you last, except the death of Mr. Philip Walters, which, although not sudden, was unexpected, and gave a shock to every one in this vicinity. The deceased gentleman may be said to have been the most influential person in this part of the country, and by his upright and honorable conduct and genial manners was both beloved and respected by all who had the good fortune to be acquainted with him. His death has been a great trial to his family, who, however, are comforted by the assurance, that their loss is his gain.

There have been no arrivals or departures of any consequence of late.

Mr. Richard Olmstead and Mr. Anson Smith started on a hunting expedition lately. They went to Muskoka and had considerable success. They shot two deer, but one got away, and they brought the other home.

Mrs. D. Brown has returned from a four weeks visit to friends and relations at Emsdale, Muskoka.

Our citizens appear to be settling down and preparing for the inevitable winter. All are in good spirits, and seem to think that life is worth living. Like the historian Mignet, Mr. Sam Caswell is proud and thankful that he has been brought into existence, and of having arrived at consciousness; and Mr. Bush, blacksmith, agrees perfectly with Mr. Ernest Renan, that it is something to have lived, and to have emerged, even for a short space, from the infinitude.

As was anticipated, the new roller flour mill here, under the able management of Mr. Freeman, has proved a success, and is assuming proportions which warrant us in the belief that it will be one of the main branches of industry for the furtherance of the prosperity of this place.

Mr. Cæsar, butcher, is coming to settle here permanently on the first of next month, which shows the great advance this place is making, as a few years ago, if any one had said that we wanted a butcher to ourselves, that person would have been immediately examined by two medical men (we have two here now), very likely have been pronounced insane, and be at present languishing in the asylum.

The wintry wind extends his blast. To-night (27th) there is sleighing here; and the signs of an open winter are gone again.

A DOUBLE PURPOSE.

The popular remedy, Hagyard's Yellow Oil, is used both internally and externally, for aches, pains, colds, croup, rheumatism, deafness, and diseases of an inflammatory nature.

An Extraordinary Operation.

A MAN ABLE TO TALK AFTER HAVING HIS TONGUE CUT OFF.

A few days ago Dr. McFarland performed an unusual operation on H. C. Ward, an old Crimean veteran, of Center street, having removed a cancer from his tongue at the General hospital. At the time the operation was so successfully performed there were some two hundred students and a number of doctors in attendance, and it was generally believed that the old man would lose his power of speech and sense of taste. Yesterday, however, Mr. Ward's son received a note from his father which stated that he would lose neither his speech nor his sense of taste, as he could already articulate quite plainly and the doctors assured him that he would soon be able to wag his tongue, or what remains of it, with as good effect as before he brought on the cancer by smoking a pipe with a broken and jagged edged stem. In the letter to the son he says he will be able to leave the hospital in about two weeks, and he concluded:—

"The doctors says I will be able to talk as well as ever, and I know I have not lost my sense of taste. There were about two hundred students present while the operation was going on, and when I came to my senses they gave me a hearty cheer.

The operation was an extraordinary one and has been reported on both sides of the Atlantic.—News.

EASILY CAUGHT.

It is very easy to catch cold, but not so easy to cure it unless you use Hagyard's Pectoral Balsam, the best remedy for all throat, bronchial and lung troubles, coughs, colds and consumptive tendencies.

THE LEIGHTON CASE.—On Monday Thomas Leighton was brought up on remand charges with stealing two pairs of boots from D. P. Urquhart, to which he pleaded guilty, but as there were twenty-four other charges of larceny against him he was further remanded. On Monday he was again brought up, when the other twenty-four claimants of stolen property were in attendance. The prisoner pleaded not guilty to all the several charges. The Chief had all the goods assorted and laid out in due order all round the court room so that he could lay his hand on each parcel as it was claimed. The Police Magistrate went through with the evidence in each case patiently which was somewhat monotonous, and was about after this wise: The Chief swore to finding the goods in the house of the prisoner, who said most of them were taken there by a colored man named Johnson. Johnson denied knowing anything about them, and the owners severally identified their goods. The contradictory statement in reference to Johnson and other circumstances showed that Johnson had no complicity with him. Johnson, who had been arrested for receiving stolen goods on information given to the Chief by Leighton, was discharged from custody on application of his counsel, Samuel Platt, Esq. The prisoner Leighton was convicted on all the twenty-five charges and sentenced to seven years in the Provincial Penitentiary at Kingston in each case, all to run concurrently. The Police Magistrate ordered restitution of the stolen property to the several owners. The prisoner was sentenced at 12:30 on Monday, and at 3 p. m. the same day was on his way to Kingston.—O. NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER XVII.

"What is wrong?" repeated the nurse. "Oh, tell me for Heaven's sake?"

"She may be able to throw some light on the mystery," said the Major. "She came here with the lady, and, as you say she is a confidential servant, I should most certainly tell her what has occurred."

"We do not know what is wrong yet," I said, answering Mrs. Rivers. "This is the gentleman—Major Esmond—in whose house Miss Gabrielle Fairfaix lived in India, and he has come to see her. He declares this lady to be a stranger to him, and not Lady Jesmond at all."

The woman's face, as she listened, assumed a livid pallor, and a fierce gleam shone in her dark eyes.

"Who dares say it?" she cried. "Who dare utter so foul a calumny?"

"I do; I dare," said the Major. "That lady is no more Gabrielle Fairfax than you are! I know Gabrielle as well as I do my own children."

The old nurse's face became more ghastly white, and a violent fit of trembling came over her.

"Can you tell us anything which will help to solve the mystery?" asked Lord Saxon.

"There is no mystery, my lord. He speaks falsely—falsely! I have not one word to say. Where is Lady Jesmond?"

"She is here," I said, moving aside. "She has fainted."

With a heart-rending cry the woman sprang and knelt down by the side of the apparently lifeless body on the couch. At the sound Lady Jesmond languidly opened her eyes and murmured something which did not reach us.

"Hush, my dear, hush!" cried the nurse; then, turning to us with anger and defiance, she added. "You will kill between you! Who dare! to say she is not Paul Jesmond's widow and the mother of this child?"

"Nello, Nello," cried the faint voice, "I—I will tell you! Send them all away—all away!"

"Hush, hush, my dear!" said Mrs. Rivers. "Lie still!" And again she turned her face to us, as she continued, "She does not know what she is saying. You will drive her mad between you!"

'Send them all away, Nello! I want to tell you—only you!" she cried.

"Take the child to the nursery, Mrs. Rivers," said Lord Saxon.

But the woman refused to go.

"I will not leave her," she declared. "She is not safe with anyone but me."

"Go," said the faint weak voice.

And, weeping bitter tears, the nurse obeyed the command of her mistress, and left the room.

"Wait for me in the dining room, Major Esmond," said Lord Saxon, "I should like to see you again before you go."

"I will," answered the Major.

And then, with a slight gesture, Lord Saxon made known to me his wish that I should remain.

"Speak out, Gabrielle," he said. "Of all people in the world, you need fear me the least, because I love you the best. Speak to me fearlessly—tell me all."

"Oh, Nello, Nello, nothing that I can say will make any difference to you—to us?"

But I remarked that he did not answer the question. So did she, for she stretched out her trembling arms to him.

"Nello, I will tell you all."

She rose from the couch, and flung herself imploringly upon her knees at his feet. She caught his hand in hers, and raised her agonised face to his. I pray Heaven I may never witness another such scene. Her golden hair hung like a glittering veil over her shoulders, and her fair loveliness was shadowed by a storm of agonized despair.

"Look at me, Nello?" she cried with passionate fervor, "Do not turn your eye from me! You will not love me less when I confess that I am a most miserable sinner. Throw your arms round me, Nello; take me to your breast. I cannot speak when I am so far from you."

But he did not move.

"Nello!" she cried again; and the piteous agony in her voice touched my heart

"Speak to me freely, Gabrielle," he said, "At present I cannot understand what all this means;" and, as he spoke he laid his hand on her head.

"I am a miserable sinner," she sobbed, after a momentary pause; "but I did not think of the wickedness of the act, and I was persuaded. I saw the enormity of my crime afterwards; but it was too late to withdraw then."

"Tell me," he said—and I noticed the change in his voice—"is what the Major said true? Are you Lady Jesmond?"

"No," she answered, "I am not. Oh, forgive me, Nello, forgive me! If I had known that I should see you and love you, I would never have done it. Oh, forgive me!"

"Will you tell me who you are?" he asked, gently but firmly.

"I am Lady Jesmond's sister," she replied. "My name is Alice, not Gabrielle." She must have caught sight of his face then, for her voice died in a wail of deep despair. "You must forgive me, Nello, you must," she persisted, "or I shall die here at your feet! If I had known that I should meet you, if I had known that the time was coming when I should see you and love you, I would rather have died than have been guilty of this sin. Great Heaven, there is no pity in your face, no love in your eyes! Your heart is growing hard and cold towards me. Let me die—let me die!"

She wrenched her hands from his, and flung herself to the ground in a frenzy of madness. I went to her, for I could not bear the sight of her despair.

"Gabrielle," I said, "do not weep so bitterly." Then, my heart aching with anguish at the sight of the beautiful wreck before me, I turned to him. "Oh, Lord Saxon, be kind to her! She loves you so well, and she is so unhappy. Be kind to her."

"Tell me all," Lord Saxon again requested.

"I cannot," she answered; "my strength fails me. Felicia, fetch my mother; she will tell you all."

"Your mother, Gabrielle? She is not here," I said.

"Ah, I forgot you do not know! Mrs. Rivers is my mother."

"Mrs. Rivers your mother!" cried Lord Saxon, in undisguised astonishment. "More deceit, more intrigue! Oh, Gabrielle, whom I believed to be true as I found you fair, how could you stoop so low?"

The only answer to this reproach was a moan of despair,

"There is a terrible scene below, Mrs. Rivers," I said, entering the nurse's room. "Will you come down please? Lady Jesmond wants you."

She seemed to fly rather than walk; and I hastened after her. Ah, the mother's instinct, the mother's love? She thought neither of Lord Saxon nor of me, but went to the girl who lay upon the carpet, crushed and helpless.

"My darling, what is it?" she cried.

For a moment the burning face of the unhappy girl appeared through the veil of oosened hair.

"Mother," she said, "tell them all! Do not keep one word back—tell them all!"

The nurse looked up with a troubled frightened face.

"You know!" she said.

"We know that lady is not Lady Jesmond," Lord Saxon broke in, "and we also know that you are Mrs. Fairfax."

"It is all discovered then!" she said despairingly. "Oh, my beautiful Alice; it would never have been done but for me—guilty miserable me!"

She turned to Lord Saxon, and kept her eyes fixed on his face the whole time that she spoke.

"My lord," she went on, "you have judged her already. I read your judgement in your eyes. Suspend it until you have heard what I have to tell."

He bowed.

"I must speak of myself for a few minutes," she said. "My husband was a poor hard-working curate who left me, when he died, with two little daughters, Gabrielle and Alice. We lived at Wavertree; and after his death I supported myself and my children by giving music-lessons there. I say 'supported'; but only Heaven knows the desperate struggle I maintained to bring up my children respectably. I never knew until recently what it was to be free from the pinch of poverty—poverty all the more bitter because it has been what the world in its satire calls 'genteel.' Of all the slow tortures that destroy life, genteel poverty is the greatest. You, my lord, who have never felt the pangs of hunger, you do not know the trials that beset those who have to battle fiercely for their daily bread. My children were good and beautiful. They were both clever; and I struggled on until they were old enough to receive educational training. I denied myself food in order that they should have enough to eat. Many a night, my lord, I have lain awake too hungry to sleep; but they knew no hunger, no cold. They were little then.

"When they grew older, through the good offices of a friend of mine, since dead, I found a home for them in a large boarding-school near Paris, where they both received an excellent education in return for the services they rendered.

"When Gabrielle was about seventeen, she had an offer of a situation in India. A lady going thither wanted a companion who could speak French. My daughter went with her; and afterwards she went to live as governess in the family of Major Esmond. She was very happy there, and often sent me money home. Still my life was a terrible struggle, and few sun-rays illumined my dreary path. I had to rent a comfortable house and dress respectably, or I should have lost all my pupils. Think, then, what news it was to me when I heard that my daughter was to marry the son and heir of Sir William Jesmond, although, as she told me, the marriage was to be kept secret. Still I understood the advantages that must accrue from it."

She paused for a few minutes. Lord Saxon did not stir; but I saw traces of deep emotion on his face.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"You cannot realize," continued Mrs. Fairfax, "what that marriage meant for me; it meant freedom from the horrible grind of poverty, which had already almost crushed the life from me; freedom from the irksome task of teaching for a miserable pittance; a fair provision of the comforts and necessaries of life—for I knew that my daughter would care for me. She did I believe that the first sum of money her husband gave her was sent to me. She told me that she would be able to do more for me after a time; that, when she returned to England, I should cease to work; that she would settle a substantial income on me; and that at last I should have the rest so long withheld from me! Think of my delight at the glowing prospect opened up to me! You cannot realise it, you who have never known want. My daughter begged me to be reticent as to her position and prospects, never to mention her marriage even to my dearest friends; and I never did—not even to poor Alice, her sister lying here, my poor beautiful Alice!"

She bent down and kissed the colourless face half hidden by the trembling hands.

"Not even Alice knew then," she reiterated, as though speaking to herself. "When the little heir was born, my daughter wrote to me again, and told me of her happiness adding that the proudest moment of her life would be when she placed her little son in my arms. For I was a good mother to both my girls, Lord Saxon."

He bowed, but did not speak. I was hoping that he would say a few words to comfort her.

"All this time," she went on, "my daughter Alice was in France. She had found an excellent situation there, and things were going better with me. Then came a period of disquiet. Gabrielle had written to me from India to say that her husband was going to Faizabad on some military business, and that he would be absent for three months.

"The next letter that came from her brought the news of his death, and that she was coming home with the little heir to Jesmond Dene. I well remember the words of her letter—

"'I shall come home to you for a few days first, mother; my heart is so completely broken by Paul's death that I could not face Jesmond Dene just yet.'

"She came to Wavertree, bringing with her no servant—only her baby boy; and on the same day my daughter Alice returned from France. For the first time since they were children, I had them together under my roof. Try to realise the temptation, Lord Saxon, and you Miss Gordon.

"We were then in my house quite alone. I had no servant, no visitor, few of my pupils came to my home and none of them knew anything of my daughters. Lady Jesmond, the child in whom all my hopes centred, was taken ill and died quite suddenly. She looked very ill when she came, for the loss of her husband had preyed on her mind and weakened her already debilitated constitution. She had never been strong; she was fragile and delicate—unlike my beautiful Alice, who was always healthy. Poor Gabrielle died of inflammation of the lungs. We called in a doctor; but, remembering all she had said about secrecy, I did not mention her name before him; he knew only that she was my daughter. Neither he nor I anticipated a serious termination to her illness, or what was done afterwards would have been impossible; but she died quite suddenly in the middle of the night, when Alice and I were in the house alone. I was terribly distressed—because of her loss chiefly, and also because of the complete shattering of all my hopes. The child might live and succeed to Jesmond Dene; but there would be no provision for me. If my daughter had lived I should have been well provided for; but here she was lying dead! Poverty and work still stared me in the face; and I was so tired! An idea—I admit that it was a wicked one—flashed across my mind showing me how I could avert the calamity which threatened my future prospects. No one knew anything about my daughter; no one knew here in England, which was Lady Jesmond and which was Alice Fairfax. Why not ask the living child to take the dead one's place?

"No one could ever know; it would hurt no one. A widowed Lady Jesmond was travelling from India; a widowed Lady Jesmond was expected at Jesmond Dene. They were both my children, and, as it could work no injury to any one, why should not the one pass for the other?"

"I thought it all over carefully, and viewed it in all its bearings. There seemed to me little harm in it; and I was so tired of poverty, so tired of work! The only danger I could foresee was the very one that has occurred—the coming home of some one from India who had known Gabrielle there; but the chances of such a thing happening appeared to me very small. She had known but few people, and those few were not likely to seek her out in England; and, if they should happen to do so, she could easily evade them. There did not seem to me to be the least danger of my plans being upset in that manner. I pondered the matter in my mind, and then I broached it to Alice.

"At first—believe me, Lord Saxon—she most positively refused to agree to my scheme. She said that it would be false, dishonourable, mean—that she would never consent to such a deception But I talked to her, and pointed out that, with her beauty and her position as Lady Jesmond, she would be able to make a briliant marriage. I persuaded her; let the blame and the punishment fall on me—I deserve it.

"I took my living daughter to the side of the dead one. I drew from my dead child's hand her wedding-ring and diamond keeper, and placed them on Alice's hand.

"'It is Alice Fairfax who lies there,' I said; 'and you are Gabrielle, Lady Jesmond.' I took the boy and placed him in her arms. 'Henceforth,' I said to her, 'this is your child.'

"I told the little fellow to call her 'mamma;' but I was much troubled by the look in the child's eyes. If he could have spoken he would have said plainly, 'This is not my mamma; she has gone away!' But he was too young to understand; nevertheless, whenever he calls Alice 'mamma' there is a questioning look in his eyes."

I wondered that I had not thought of that before, for I had often heard the cry of the child for his mother and seen his strange, inquiring gaze. This confession made clear to me many of the mysterious things I had observed during the past twelve months.

"We had no trouble in successfully carrying on the deception," Mrs. Fairfax continued. "No one suspected what had been done. Alice took possession of Gabrielle's trunks, of her clothes, her jewels, her papers, of the package left by Captain Jesmond to be given to his wife. Who was there to say that she was not Gabrielle, Lady Jesmond? The doctor's certificate was made out in the name of Alice Fairfax, and in Wavertree churchyard the name of Alice Fairfax is engraved on my dead daughter's tombstone.

"But, when all was arranged, my daughter grew nervous. 'It is a fraud and a deception,' she declared; and more than once she told me that she had not the courage to carry it through. She consented to represent her sister only on condition that I would come with her and act as nurse to the child. Then, and not till then, did she consent to come. She made me promise that I would live with her always; and we have been very happy. Oh, my beautiful Alice, have I crushed you by my miserable folly?"

Her voice died away in bitter sobs as she knelt by her daughter's side; and she who had for so long been known as Lady Jesmond opened her arms and pillowed the gray head upon her bosom.

"Never mind, mother," she said. "Do not cry so, dear: all will be well yet. Nello will forgive me."

But I knew, from the stern pained expression on his face, that he would never take her to his heart again. He was "a worshipper of beauty and a dreamer of dreams;" but he was a man who valued honour and integrity, who could not tolerate deceit. I knew her doom, poor girl, before he pronounced it.

"You will forgive us both, my lord?" said the weeping mother.

"Your sin was not against me," he replied gravely. "You have wronged Miss Gordon more than you have wronged me."

"Felicia, you will forgive me?" pleaded Alice Fairfax.

"I forgive you, dear, with all my heart," I replied.

"You have always been good to me, Felicia," she went on, "although I took so much from you."

She did not know—she would never know—all that she had taken, or all that I had lost.

"Felicia has forgiven me," she said, in a trembling voice. "Nello, you will not refuse me pardon?"

"Forgive us, my lord!" sobbed Mrs. Fairfax again.

"Not only do I forgive you entirely," said Lord Saxon, "but it shall be my care and my pleasure to provide for your future, Mrs. Fairfax. You shall know want no more."

She turned quickly and kissed his hand.

"I thank you, my lord," she said gratefully; but her daughter's voice interrupted her further expression of thanks.

"Nello, Nello," cried the unhappy girl, "speak to me—think of me!"

"Will you leave us?" he said to Mrs. Fairfax. "I wish to talk to your daughter for a short time." Then, noting the violence of her grief, he added, "Do not weep so bitterly. It was a great folly—a wretched mistake; but it is too late now to repair it. I can only say this—that your future shall be my care. Leave me with your daughter now."

And, still weeping most bitterly, Mrs. Fairfax left the room.

Lord Saxon walked over to Alice Fairfax, and stood by her side, gravely looking down at the face he had so often smiled upon.

"Alice!" he said, "It seems strange to give you that name."

She looked up to him with eager passionate eyes.

"Shall I never be 'Gabrielle' to you again?" she asked.

"No—never more," he answered gravely. "The name was not yours, and you should not have borne it."

"Oh, Nello, Nello, if you will not forgive me, kill me! I cannot live without you!" she cried.

"It is no question of forgiveness," he said coldly; "my dear, beautiful as you are, and dearly as I love you, we must part."

The Evolution of Names.

Annabella is not Anna-bella, or fair Anna, but is the feminine of Hannibal, meaning gift (or grace) of Bel. Arabella is not Arabella, or beatiful altar, but Orabel, a prying woman. In its Anglicized form of Orabel, it was much more common in the thirteenth century, than at present. Maurice has nothing to do with Mauritis, or a Moor, but comes from Almarica—himmelreich—the kingdom of Heaven. Ellen is the feminine of Alain, Alan or Allan, and has no possible connection with Helen, which comes from a different language, and is older by 1,000 years, at least. Amy, is not from amee, but from amie. Avice, or Avis, does not exactly mean advice. as some think. It comes from Ædwis, and means unhappy wisdom. Eliza has no connection with Elizabeth. It is the sister of Louisa, and both are the daughters of Heloise, which is Hele-wis, hidden wisdom. There is, indeed, another form of Louisa, or rather Louise, which is the feminine of Louis, but this was scarcely heard of before the sixteenth century. The older Heloise form of the name, Aloisa, Aloisia, or Aloysia, was adopted into mediæval English as Alesia—a name which our old genealogists confuse with Alice. Emily and Amelia are not different forms of one name. Emily is from Æmylia, the name of an Etruscan gens. Amelia comes from the Gothic amala, heavenly. Reginald is not derived from Regina, and has nothing to do with a queen. It is Rem-alt, exalted purity. Alic, Adelais, Adelaide, Aliza, Alix, Adaline are all forms of one name, the root of which is adel, noble. But Annie was never used as identical with Annis or Agnes (of which last the old Scottish Annas is a variety); nor, as is sturdily maintained, was Elizabeth ever synonymous with Isabel.

It Wasn't His Heart.

"I hope you will be a better boy in the future," said his mother.

"Yes'm," sobbed the boy.

"I guess you will mind your father next time he speaks to you."

"Yes'm."

"Poor boy!" she added, sympathetically, "did he touch your heart?"

"No m."

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of Catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

LATEST TRIAL OF NIHIL

Army and Navy Officers Conspiring Against the Czar's Government.

In the Military District Court Petersburg, fourteen Nihilists highest standing in their party were recently tried. The trial was conducted with the utmost secrecy, no persons except the officials concerned in the being admitted to the court room. facts disclosed during the trial of the most startling character. clearly proved that in the Czar's and navy there is a military revolutionary organization with numerous branches working all over Russia.

The fourteen defendants in the were: Lieut.-Col. Michael Ashenbrenner of the Fifty-ninth Lubin Regiment, Nicholas Pohitonoff, Second Captain the Ninth Artillery Brigade; Nikolai Rogatcheff. Lieutenant of the Tver eighth Artillery Brigade; Alexander Ivanovitch. Sub Lieutenant of the Tiraspol Regiment; Ensign Ivan Yovatchek of the Navy: Lieut. Baron Alexander Stromberg of the navy; Vera Figner, a noble-woman; Linbov Tchernoff, a priest's daughter; Lindmila Konstein, a physician's wife; Apollon Nemolovsky, a priest's son; Demetry Lorovtzeff, a priest's son: Athanasy Sidony-Basmandjy, a merchant's son; Vladimir Tchnikoff, a nobleman, and Vasily Ivanoff, a merchant's son.

With the single exception of Tchemodanoff, who aimed at a change in Government by peaceful means, the defendants belonged to the extreme faction of the Nihilists—the Terrorists—and took an active part in the most terrible Nihilist plots. Some of them had been so for for many years. Thus Vera Figner, known as "the beautiful Nihilist," has been tracked since 1875, when she found spreading revolutionary ideas among the peasantry. In 1876 she took part in a street demonstration before the Kazan Cathedral of St. Petersburg. In 1879, in a Nihilist congress, she assisted in framing the Nihilist war policy—terrorism—and in the same year she and her comrades in digging a mine in Odessa. She was one of those who prepared the bombs which were thrown at the Czar on March 13, 1881. In 1880 she set on foot some revolutionary societies among the workingmen. In 1882 she was one of those who planned and carried out the assassination of Gen. Strelnikoff. Afterwards she was very active in organizing military revolutionary societies

Mrs. Dr. Volkenstein kept the conspirator house in Kerkoff, and took part in the assassination of the Kerkoff governor, Prince Kranotkin. Miss Tchemodanoff was arrested in 1883 in the city of Kharkoff, in a house where were found false passes, seals, revolutionary pamphlets, and a Nihilist printing press.

Lieut. Col. Ashenbrenner began, in 1882, in the city of Nicholaieff, a military revolutionary society, to which many officers of the Praga Regiment belonged. In his rooms the Nihilist officers of the army and the navy held their secret meetings. He propagated revolutionary pamphlets, not only among the officers, but also among the soldiers of the regiment, and raised funds for revolutionary purposes. He was in constant communication with the members of the Executive Committee, such as Vera Figner and Degaieff. Capt. Pohitonoff, being a member of the St. Petersburg Military Revolutionary Society, scattered revolutionary pamphlets among his comrades, the officers of the Military Academy, and also among the soldiers under his command.

Lieut. Rogatcheff was an active Nihilist after 1880, and an intimate friend of the regicides whom he assisted in many ways. He propagated revolutionary ideas among officers and soldiers in different places in Russia. In 1883, following the advice of Vera Figner, he retired from the army, and dedicated all his time and efforts to the formation of the Military Revolutionary Corps.

Sub-Lieut. Tihanovitch, while he was the chief of the guards at the Kieff Fortress, set free a Nihilist preacher, Ivanoff, having furnished him with an officer's uniform. Ensign Youvatcheff formed a military revolutionary society among his comrades, the naval officers at Nikolaieff. Lieut. Baron Stromberb was very intimate with the regicides, and knew all their plans. He was one of the favorers of the St. Petersburg Military Revolutionary Society. Sophy Perovsky, who executed regicide, Vera Figner, and other members of the Executive Committee were his constant visitors. The Baron Rogatcheff, and Pohitonoff, took charge of the bombs, the printing press, the proclamations, and other Nihilist goods supplied by the regicides.

Apollo Nemolovsky was in charge of the secret printing press in Kharkoff. Tchnikoff took part in an attempt to rob the Imperial Treasury at Gory. Spandony-Basmandjy was in charge of a secret printing house at Odessa. Surovtzeff kept in his house in Moscow a secret printing office, and fabricated false passes for the Nihilists. Tchnikoff kept in Kharkoff a secret lithographic establishment for Nihilist purposes. Ivanoff distributed revolutionary pamphlets among the workmen of Moscow, and the most trustworthy of them were enlisted in the revolutionary corps.

The trial lasted only four days, and all the defendants were found guilty. Figner, Lindmila Volkenstein, Lieut. Col. Ashenbrenner, Capt. Pohitonoff, Sub Lieut. Tihanovitch, Ensign Youvatcheff, Lieut. Rogatcheff, and Baron Stromberg were sentenced to death by the Czar, however, has granted life to the six first named, approving the sentence of death in the cases of the two others, Baron Stromberg and Lieut. Rogatcheff, who were hanged. The rest of the defendants were sent to Siberia for from four years, "to the end of life."

Lieutenant of the Twenty-eighth Artillery Brigade; Alexander Tihanovitch. Sub Lieutenant of the 131st Tirapol Regiment; Ensign Ivan Youvatchek of the Navy: Lieut. Baron Alexander Stromberg of the navy; Vera Figner, a noble-woman; Linbov Tchemodanoff, a priest's daughter; Lindmila Volkenstein, a physician's wife; Apollo Nemolovsky, a priest's son; Demetry Surovtzeff, a priest's son; Athanasy Spandony-Basmandjy, a merchant's son; Vladimir Tchnikoff, a nobleman, and Vasily Ivanoff, a merchant's son.

With the single exception of Miss Tchemodanoff, who aimed at a change of Government by peaceful means, the defendants belonged to the extreme faction of the Nihilists—the Terrorists—and took an active part in the most terrible Nihilist plots. Some of them had been sought for for many years. Thus Vera Figner, known as "the beautiful Nihilist," had been tracked since 1875, when she was found spreading revolutionary ideas among the peasantry. In 1876 she took part in a street demonstration before the Kazan Cathedral of St. Petersburg. In 1879, in a Nihilist congress, she assisted in framing the Nihilist war policy—Terrorism—and in the same year she aided her comrades in digging a mine in Odessa. She was one of those who prepared the bombs which were thrown at the Czar on March 13, 1881. In 1880 she set on foot some revolutionary societies among the workingmen. In 1882 she was one of those who planned and carried out the assassination of Gen. Strelnikoff. Afterwards she was very active in organizing military revolutionary societies.

Mrs. Dr. Volkenstein kept the conspirator house in Karkoff, and took part in the assassination of the Karkoff Governor, Prince Krapotkin. Miss Tchemodanoff was arrested in 1883 in the city of Kharkoff, in a house where were found false passes, seals, revolutionary pamphlets, and a Nihilist printing press.

Lieut.-Col. Ashenbrenner organized in 1882, in the city of Nicholaieff, a miliary revolutionary society, to which many officers of the Praga Regiment belonged. In his rooms the Nihilist officers of both the army and the navy held their criminal meetings. He propagated revolutionary pamphlets, not only among the officers, but also among the soldiers of his regiment, and raised funds for revolutionary purposes. He was in constant communication with the members of the executive Committee, such as Vera Figner, and Degaieff. Capt. Pohitonoff, being a member of the St. Petersburg Military Revolutionary Society, scattered revolutionary pamphlets among his comrades, the officers of the Military Academy, and also among the soldiers under his command.

Lieut. Rogatcheff was an active Nihilist after 1880, and an intimate comrade of the regicides whom he assisted in many ways. He propagated revolutionary ideas among officers and soldiers in different places in Russia. In 1883, following the advice of Vera Figner, he retired from the army, and dedicated all his time and efforts to the formation of the Military Revolutionary Corps.

Sub-Lieut. Tihanovitch, while he was the chief of the guards at the Kieff Fortress, set free a Nihilist prisoner, Ivanoff, having furnished him with an officer's uniform. Ensign Youvatcheff formed a military revolutionary society among his comrades, the naval officers at Nicholaeff. Lieut. Baron Stromberb was very intimate with the regicides, and knew of all their plans. He was one of the founders of the St. Petersburg Military Revolutionary Society. Sophy Perovsky, the executed regicide, Vera Figner, and other members of the Executive Committee, were his constant visitors. The Baron, Rogatcheff, and Pohitonoff, took charge of the bombs, the printing press, the proclamations, and other Nihilist goods left by the regicides.

Apollo Nemolovsky was in charge of the secret printing press in Kharkoff. He took part in an attempt to rob the Sub Treasury at Gory. Spandony-Basmandly was in charge of a secret printing house at Odessa. Surovtzeff kept in Moscow a secret printing office, and fabricated false passes for the Nihilists. Tchnikoff kept in Kharkoff a secret lithographic establishment for Nihilist purposes. Ivanoff distributed revolutionary pamphlets among the workmen of Kieff, and the most trustworthy of them he enlisted in the revolutionary corps.

The trial lasted only four days, and all the defendants were found guilty. Vera Figner, Lindmila Volkenstein, Lieut.-Col. Ashenbrenner, Capt. Pohitonoff, Sub Lieut. Tihanovitch, Ensign Youvatcheff, Lieut. Rogatcheff, and Baron Stromberg were sentenced to death. The Czar, however, has granted life to the six first named, approving the sentence of death in the cases of the two others—Baron Stromberg and Lieut. Rogatcheff—who were hanged. The rest of the defendants were sent to Siberia for from four years, "to the end of life."

The journals of this city were afraid to make any comments on this trial. Mr. Katkoff of the Moscow Vedomosti said:

"Formerly our Government had to deal with students and mechanics, and now among the conspirators there are officers of the army and the navy. A Lieutenant-Colonel cannot be put on the same footing with a dismissed student. God forbid that further researches should disclose conspirators still higher in rank! Our army and navy are guilty of treason. So far we have gone by abolishing the Government in principle."

The Effect of Imagination.

At a large hotel in Suffolk, the not uncommon dilemma arose of there being only one room in the house vacant when two visitors required accommodation for the night. It was a double-bedded chamber, or was soon converted into such, and the two guests—who were both commercial travellers—agreed to share it. One of these gentlemen was a confirmed hypochondriac, and greatly alarmed his companion by waking him up in the middle of the night, gasping for breath. "Asthma," he'panted out; "I am subject to these spasmodic attacks open the window quickly; give me air!" Terrified beyond measure, the other jumped out of bed. But the room was pitch-dark; he had no matches, and he had forgotten the position of the window. "For heaven's sake be quick!" gasped the invalid. "Give me more air, or I shall choke." At length, by dint of groping wildly and upsetting half the furniture in the apartment the window was found: but it was an old-fashioned casement, and no hasp or catch was to be discovered. "Quick, quick; air, air!" implored the apparantly dying man. "Open it, break it, or I shall be suffocated!" Thus adjured his friend lost no time, but, seizing a boot smashed every pane; and the sufferer immediately experienced great relief. "Oh, thank you, a thousand thanks. Ha," he exclaimed, drawing deep sighs, which testified to the great comfort he derived; "I think in another moment I should have been dead!" And when he had sufficiently recovered, and had expressed his heartfelt gratitude, he described the intense distress of these attacks, and the length of time he had suffered with them. After a while, both fell to sleep again, devoutly thankful for the result. It was a warm summer night, and they felt no inconvenience from the broken window; but when daylight relieved the pitchy darkness of the night, the window was found to be still entire! Had invisible glaziers been at work already, or was the episode of the past night only a dream? No; for the floor was still strewn with the broken glass. Then, as they looked around the room in amazement, the solution of the mystery presented itself in the shape of an antiquated bookcase, whose latticed glass doors were a shattered wreck. The spasmodically attacked one was cured from that moment. So much for imagination!

Out-Door Novels.

Reading a book out-doors one can find out how its pages will accord with certain phases of nature, so to speak. Ten to one what had seemed quite perfect, read in the atmosphere of the library, will fall off to a mere skeleton in the open air. I have found that, strange as it may seem, the poems of Burns lose something by outside reading, whilst certain passages of Tennyson; Browing, and Emerson reach out and gather an increment of freshness from gastoral surroundings. The humorists, as a rule, require to be read within the limitations of four walls. A novel that will bear the sunlight and the winds and the bird songs may be set down as a thoroughly good one. Short, crisp stories, not too tragic, having strong local color and bright conversations stand this test very well. Our magazines fall into the error of printing, during the out-door season, light society stories of city life; these fade into colorless and tasteless films when read on the beach, or in the open country.[—Outing for December.

How Glass Eyes Wear Out.

The most perfect glass eyes are made in Thuringia, Germany, and have a more natural appearance than any others. The iris is covered with silver and the blood-vessels with gold, and, when properly inserted, they will move as readily as their natural companion. Of course much depends upon the condition of socket and the state of the muscles as left by the surgeon. Our greatest trouble is the matching of the eyes. You see, eyes wear out, their life being about a year or a little over, though occasionally I see one that has lasted a much longer time. The salt and alkaline solutions of the tear ducts, however, have an effect upon the surface of the glass, and eventually roughen it, so that a new eye is necessary. Here's one, you can see how rough its surface is, and how its colors are dimmed.—[Philadelphia Press Interview.

Jewish Exemption from Cholera.

Some of the Jewish papers are pointing out that in Toulon and Marseilles the Jewish population, which by no means always lives in the healthiest parts of those towns, has been singularly exempt from the ravages of the cholera, says the Pall Mall Gazette. They unhesitatingly attribute this escape to the dietary and hygienic regulations prescribed by the Mosaic ritual. The probability is, however, that the Jews have been inured to miasma and all kinds of disease germs during the centuries of their confinement to their ghettos. All the weakly Jews being killed off, a plague-proof variety has alone survived. Perhaps modern sanitary reformers are apt to overlook the valuable body of hygienic truths contained in these ancient ordinances. The traditional health of Jewish colonies in all parts of the world amid the most violent epidemics is a significant fact, at any rate.

ODDS AND ENDS.

The tallest of success is nothing more than doing what you can do well, and doing well whatever you do without a thought of fame.

Do not arraign the rain while it holds the reigns, for its reign will soon be over when Sol gets his ray in. Then he will be arrayin' the earth in beauty.

A prominent Michigan lumberman, whose wealth was too much for his democratic peace of mind, got out a patent of nobility and a coat-of-arms recently His motto was "Vidi." Only his classical friends knew it meant "I saw."

"Sal, is anybody a-courtin' on ye?" inquires an anxious friend. "Wal, yes," says Sal, "there's a feller kinder sorter courtin' on me an' kinder sorter not, but rather more kinder sorter not than kinder sorter." There are plenty of that sort, by the way.

A recently propounded conundrum by a member of the Lower House of the British Parliament: "What is the difference between the House of Commons and the House of Lords?" Answer: "One has ability; the other nobility."

Said Brown to Parker: "What's the difference between a watermelon and a cabbage?" "Give it up; can't tell." Brown laughed softly, as he said: "You'd be a nice man to send to buy a watermelon, you would."

Eulalia (sentimentally)—"Oh, no! I have no desire for great wealth. I should be happy, very happy as the wife of a noble bread-winner." George (practically)—"And I should be happy, very happy, as the husband of a good bread-maker." She concluded to learn.

A little Vermont girl called at a drug store, and said: "My mother wants ten cents worth of jumps." This astonished the clerk. The child insisted that it was jumps she had been sent for; but returned to her mother for further instructions. Very soon she came back and said it was hops she wanted.

At a meeting in London, to receive a report from the missionaries sent to discover the tribes of Israel, Lord H——— was asked to take the chair. "I take," he replied, "a great interest in your researches, gentlemen. The fact is, I have borrowed money from all the Jews now known, and if you can find a new set I shall feel very much obliged."

A Deadwood husband issues this advertisement: "My wife Sarah has Shot my ranche. When I dident Do a thing Too hur an' I want it distinctly Understood that any man That takes hur In an' keers fur hur On my account Wil get himself pumped so Full of lead that Sum tenderfoot will locate him fur a Mineral clame. A word To the wise is suficient an' orter work on fools."

"My pa's poorly, and ma's gone away till he's better, she has," said one little Hoboken girl to another the other day. "What's your ma gone away for?" asked the other diminutive gossip. "Because the doctor said pa had to be quiet, and pa said he thought he couldn't be quiet with ma about the house, so ma had to go."

Tommy was a little rogue, whom his mother had hard work to manage. Their house in the country was raised a few feet from the ground, and Tommy, to escape a well-deserved whipping, ran from his mother and crept under the house. Presently the father came home, and hearing where the boy had taken refuge, crept under to bring him out. As he approached on his hands and knees, Tommy asked, "Is she after you, too?"

Fitznoodle was out again worrying the life out of the ducks with his shot-gun. He blazed away at some ducks, and an unseen man on the other side of the pond rose up, threateningly, with a long gun, and called out: "Did you shoot at me?" "Did any of the shot hit you?" inquired Fitznoodle. "Yes, they did," said the man, rubbing his legs. "Then you may be certain I didn't shoot at you. I never hit anything I shoot at."

A person of an odd turn of mind, riding on horseback, met with another equal to himself in a lane so narrow that neither could pass without giving way, which neither would do. Both made a halt, and not a word was spoken till the first-mentioned took a newspaper out of his pocket, which he began to read to himself with great composure. The other, determined to exhibit an equal degree of patience, took his snuff-box from his pocket, and very leisurely taking a pinch of snuff, gravely said, "Sir, when you have done with that paper, I shall be glad to look at it." This so pleased the humorist that he immediately took off his spectacles, seized him by the hand, and insisted on his going home to dine with him.

Johnson once made a bet with Boswell that he could go into the fish market and put a woman in a passion without saying a word she could understand. The doctor commenced by silently indicating with his nose that her fish had passed the state in which a man's olfactories could endure their odor. The Billingsgate lady made a verbal attack common in parlance. The doctor answered: "You are an article, madam." "No more an article than yourself, you misbegotten villain." "You are a noun, woman." "You—you," stammered the woman, choking with rage at a list of titles she could not understand. "You are a pronoun." The bedlam shook her fist in speechless rage. "You are a verb, an adverb, an adjective, a conjunction, a preposition, an interjection!" suddenly continued the doctor, applying the harmless epithets at proper intervals. The nine parts of speech completely conquered the old woman, and she flung herself down in the mud, crying with rage at being thus "blackguarded" in a set of unknown terms, which, not understanding, she could not answer.

Oiling the Waves.

Oiling the waves has been recently been the subject of investigation and exhaustive report by Captain H. W. Chetwynd, R. N., Chief Inspector of Lifeboats, at the instance of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution of Great Britain. The Telegraph, London, reports the results as follows:

"Various conditions of the sea and all manner of oils were tested, and in reference to the latter Captain Chetwynd says they are all very much alike in their effect. Only very small quantities of oil indeed were necessary for covering a considerable distance with a smooth, glassy surface. The effects of this oil film in rollers that would endanger the safety of small open boats was most marked. It entirely stopped their breaking, leaving only the undulations or roll of a harmless well, and thereby robbed them of their danger; but in surf of sufficient magnitude to be of importance to a lifeboat, or such as are ordinarily encountered by them, this effect was very much modified, and frequently entirely absent. On more than one occasion, in a moderate surf, which the oil was entirely 'killing,' if a larger breaker than the surrounding one rose the oil was powerless to check it, and the sea broke through it, covering boat, gear, etc., with oil. Its want of power to overcome the dangerous part of a heavy surf in shoal water (viz, the break) was clearly shown on more than one occasion, even when the oily film could be distinctly seen on the surface between the breakers. It seemed to fail in a very marked and curious way to have any effect on breakers caused by a heavy ground swell, and not by wind, on the coast of Cornwall. To be any protection, says Captain Chetwynd, it must be applied to the sea from the boat or vessel in the direct line from which the seas are advancing, and at sufficient distance to give it time to spread and act upon the waves before they reach the vessel to be protected. This could only be done in a lifeboat in two positions, viz., first, when at anchor and laying head to sea and tide; and, secondly, when running dead before the sea for the shore. In another position, even supposing the oil to be calming the sea, it would most probably be impossible to keep the boat within its influence, and proceed toward a wreck, or other desired point, at the same time. This difficulty would be considerably enhanced by the fact of the tide or current, on the greater part of the coast, setting with more or less velocity along shore. Under these circumstances, Captain Chetwynd is of opinion that no practical advantage can arise from the use of oil in the boats of the Institution, and he cannot, therefore, recommend its being supplied to them.

"With respect to its use as a protection to ordinary open boats in (to them) dangerous surf or breakers, the experiments appear to demonstrate clearly that, although it cannot be considered a 'specific' certain to insure immunity from danger in all cases, yet in many cases it would prove a very material protection, and go far to insure the boat passing safely through what would otherwise prove very dangerous, and possibly fatal, seas, and on that account alone its adoption cannot be too strongly urged for boats having or likely to have to encounter these dangers. As to the effect of oil in the open sea, Captain Chetwynd could not make personal experiments, but from well-authenticated cases he believes that it is considerably more beneficial than off shore, and he strongly recommends vessels to carry oil, with perforated canvas bags for its distribution. The application of oil at harbor entrances is also advantageous to a certain extent, but there remain many practical difficulties in the way."

Luxurious Bathing.

A writer on health says: One does not need the Atlantic Ocean or even a river to get the benefit of a bath. A wash basin, a broad, flat pan to stand in, and two cans or jugs of water, hot and cold, will answer every purpose. The effect of the hot water followed by the cold is very curious. I have the pleasure of knowing a lady who found it so good for her own ailment that she tried it on her plants. A fading fern revived at once to vigorous life. Try it for rheumatism and neuralgia. Try it for any maladies you may have. It is good for a local application; but general treatment is best in all cases if you can compass it. Make the whole body more alive, and every part will feel the benefit—besides, life flows where it is most needed. A good invigorating bath removes local congestions, and distributes as well as increases the force of health.

Child Venders.

In Nankin and Kai-fun children from 6 to 12 years of age are sold by tens of thousands. Not hired out or transferred—but sold for a small sum in cash, in consideration of which the progenitor, by a tacit understanding, renounces all parental rights, even the right of inquiring into the fate of his offspring. The purchasing trader may be the middle man of a well-to-do childless couple, or the agent of a wholesale tea-planter or a coolie-breeder, raising or training slaves for a foreign market. For the equivalent of £3 any commission peddler will undertake to "adopt" the same number of young mongols in the name of any employer, and at very short notice. The authorities might object to a formal and public purchase, but the meaning of the adopting transaction is well understood and connived at. It is a lesser evil, and few parents ask any questions. Rather than see their child starve they will resign them to any fate—with one exception: The orthodox Buddhists seem to have evinced occasional scruples in delivering up their youngsters to the proselytising missionaries, whom they suspect of all sorts of damnable practices. But even such scruples can be readily outweighed by a few extra dollars.

LIVING ON THE MOON.

A Chat with the Telescope Fiend—Peculiarities of People Who Take a

"There ain't much in this murky weather for me," said the telescope man on the common to a Boston "Globe" reporter. "I've been out all day, expectin' to git a clear sky for a bit, but the whul o' Cambridge couldn't un'arth the sun today, I'll bet."

"Why do you come out such weather?" was asked.

"Waal, its like this: If people don't see me they begins to think I've immigrated, an' ye cawn't tell w'ether but what the sun might come out. Besides, don't seem as how I'm alive if I hain't out in some sort o' weather."

"Do you have regular customers?"

"Oh. Bless your heart, yes; big uns an' little uns, young an' old. It's them I'm thinkin' 'bout, rain or shine, I want 'em to see I'm round if the sun ain't."

"What can be seen in the day now?"

"Venus is no good now; she's got too far away from the 'arth. You can catch a glimpse of her, but it ain't worth the money, so I rely on the moon. I've had mighty hard luck with her, too, lately, day an' night, There hain't been a square look at her since she came in, the weather's been so bad. Venus was good pay while she lasted, but she's been slidin' away some time, and purty soon she'll be clean out o' sight. 'Long 'bout April she'll begin to git visible again."

"Do you find the moon quite enough to work on?" was asked, with what was thought an effort to be funny.

"I can make a good square living on the moon," the astronomer replied, in dead earnest, "if you'll give her a clear sky. Not ten people out of a hundred knows that you can see the moon in daytime, an' half of 'em looking through this instrument believes I'm lyin' when I tell 'em they're a lookin at the moon. Country folks know more 'bout the moon than city-folks, an' I frequently have 'em tell me they can see the moon to home."

"What are the sights at night?"

"Saturn and his rings just now. He ain't out till 'long 'bout half-past ten o'clock. Ten o'clock's only 'about the shank of the evening here, anyhow. People going home from the theayter likesto take a peep, 'ticularly the ladies, bless 'em! Jupiter an' his moons won't be out agin till four years from now."

He was asked if his portable observatory paid.

"Waal; I makes it a profession," he replied. "You can judge from that. This instrument cost me $1,100, an' I'm havin' a larger glass made to Cambridge now. It i'll be done in December. It's a good 'nough business in New England, whar there's more 'tention paid to astronomy than anywhar. Boston is the best payin' place in the country for it. There ain't half the 'tention paid to astronomy there should be. Not ten out of a hundred knows whether its Saturn's got rings an' Jupiter moons, an' half of 'em put the rings on Jupiter. Every public school ought to be armed with an instrument like this," said the old man, emphatically, "an' teachers shouldn't be allowed to teach astronomy without havin' a telescope right thar to prove what they say. They ought to be made to know the heavenly bodies jest like geography. What Boston ought to do is to put an instrument 'bout the size o' this right here on the common, an' pay a man to tend it an' make it free to everybody."

"Wouldn't that interfere some with your business?"

"I'm willing to make the sacrifice any day for the good of science," and the wise man folded up his observatory, stuck his head through it and walked off.

A Strange Story.

There has been a strange story circulating for some time that a Fenian or Dynamite Council has been for a good while back in session at a village in the borderland of the Pyrenees. It will be remembered that about four months ago there was a report that several prominent Fenians had suddenly quitted Paris; it was supposed to escape the vigilance of the detectives. They were tracked to Madrid, however, but after a week or a fortnight they disappeared in a manner which completely baffled the officers. The theory was that they had made their way over here, but recently the French authorities received information from an English tourist which led to the discovery that a company of political conrpirators have been for some time quietly ensconced in the district of Pau. It is said the Maire of the commune is of Irish descent, and that through his influence and by other means the two parish gendarmes, whose duty it was to report the presence and movements of strange or suspicious individuals, were induced to keep silence. The group are, or were, when word of their discovery was sent to Paris, to gether, but as the detectives immediately made for the place, it is likely their coming dispersed them. There is much suggestion about the arrangements made and the exploits decided on at the conference.

Nothing Like Realism.

Miss Florence St. John, the London actress weary of charming humanbeings, has turned her attention to the gentle cobra with killing effect. Miss St. John, to put it in another way, plays the part of snake charmer in "The Grand Mogul," at the Comedy The corbras are fine, well developed specimens, whose elegant movements were not at first so very much admired by the prima donna, but now she ties them in knots around her neck and lets them kiss her without so much as a shudder. The cobras, are, in fact, highly popular in the theatre and rehearse with the other performers in a most satisfactory manner. Nothing pays like realism nowadays. The scene should draw the town.

MARKDALE DEC. 4, 1884.

MUNICIPAL MATTERS.

In Artemesia the present probabilities are that the old council will be re-elected.

We hear of no opposition to our Glenelg Reeve, Mr. Davis. He is a very proper person for the position, and will doubtless hold it. at least for the coming year. We have not heard of any opposition to the Deputy, J. A. McMillan. The council will seek re-election, and stand a good chance of being returned.

In Holland, matters are quiet. It is thought Mr. Cameron, the Reeve. will have no opposition. We understand Messrs. Shute and Norton will be candidates for Deputy-Reeve. The old council will seek re-election, all except perhaps M. Howey, who is not certain whether he will be a candidate. Mr. John Murray will likely try it again. If the East ward wishes to have a representative they will have to decide on one man, as by having a number of candidates they are sure to loose all. We would suggest Mr. Jas. Freeborn as a very fit and proper person for the position, and well qualified to ably represent the East ward. There are, however, other good men; the only difficulty will be in deciding on one.

Euphrasia municipal politics are already assuming a business-like aspect. Mr. Gilray will doubtless be elected Reeve by acclamation. He has proved himself a painstaking and efficient representative, and a good financier, and stands high in the estimation of the ratepayers. Mr. Wm. Fawcett, the present Deputy-Reeve, is busy canvassing. D. R. Ellis is undecided whether he will take the field or not. Jas. Erskine has announced his determination of again offering himself as a candidate for the Deputy-Reeve. He has been many years in the council, and will doubtless take that position at the coming election. As a business man and efficient representative he is head and shoulders above the present Deputy. The present councillors have discharged their duties faithfully and proved themselves worthy the confidence reposed in them. They are Messrs. Boyd, Black and Hurd; and will all seek re-election. Report has it that W. J. Shepherdson, the famous auctioneer, will again offer his services as councillor.

In Osprey we hear of no particular stir as yet. Mr. Gamey will, no doubt, be re-elected to the office of Reeve. He is an able representative at home as well as at the County Council. The other members of the council are economical and careful of the interests of the township, and in all probability will seek, and succeed in being re-elected.

CONSERVATIVE MEETING.

A meeting of the East Grey Conservatives was held in Markdale on Monday last to appoint delegates to the Provincial Association about to be organized, and to have the Riding represented at the Banquet to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald on the 17th December.

There were present, N. McColman, M. P. P., President; T. Kells, Vice-President; John Lyons, Recording Secretary; T. S. Sproule, M. D., M.P., and a very large representation from all parts of the riding.

The following were appointed delegates to Toronto:—

Andrews, John Veitch, Joseph Rorke, Wm. Sparling, Jas. Brodie, Wm. McLoughry, Rich. Watson, A. McGirr, J. C. Irish, H. McDonald, Thos. Brown, M. Akitt, John McArthur, T. Hanbury, Isaac Traynor, Jas. Lamon, John Abbott, P. McGregor, J. McArdle, E. Potts, F. Winter, C. McDowell, W. T. Parsons, D. K. McArthur, W. Kerr, W. Pringle, J. Nelson, J. Brian, G. Warling, N. Irish, J. W. Morrow, J. Elliott, S. Edgerton, S. Damude, W. H. Dodson, G. Swanton, M. Richardson, R. J. Sproule, C. Devitt, C. R. Sing, M. Robinson, J. J. Johnston, N. Reid, H. Chisholm, R. Kerr, James Bowes, J. Burnett, W. Ward, T. Gilray, W. Fawcett, N. Smith, G. McAlister, Thos. Lowe, J. Erskine, A. Erskine, Dr. Christoe, J. Shaw, T. Shaw, J. Galloway, J. Gillespie, J. R. Sing, R. Cornett, R. Hector, J. Sparling.

After the above business was completed the business of the annual meeting was taken up. Mr. N. McColman handed in his resignation as President of E. G. L. C. Association. The resignation was accepted, and Mr. Kells, Vice-President, elected to fill his place. Mr. T. Gilray, Reeve of Euphrasia, was then elected Vice-President. Mr. John Lyons, Recording Secretary. Wm. Douglas, Treasurer; and the following corresponding secretaries were appointed: W. J. Grier, Thos. Hanbury and Jas. Brodie. Auditors, Wm. Lucas and R. J. Sproule. Dep.-Vice-Presidents, Jas. Erskine, Euphrasia; Thos. McMurchy Collingwood; A. Freeborn, Holland; A. Elliott, Artemesia; A. McGirr, Osprey; J. McArdle, Proton; N. Reid, St. Vincent; H. Chisholm, Meaford; R. Slack, Melancthon.

After business the Convention were treated to a sumptuous supper at the Markdale House by Dr. Sproule, M. P.

"WHY NOT FLESHERTON?"

The Flesherton Advance makes a feeble attempt to represent that village, a more convenient point for Thornbury merchants to reach, in bringing freight over the C. P. R. than Markdale. The editor should remember that it is a point on the C. P. R. Thornbury wishes to reach; and farthermore, if there is any truth in the statements contained in various articles which has appeared in the Advance, urging the township to construct a passable road from Flesherton to the railway station, we would naturally conclude that the Advance simply advocates the road via Flesherton to reach Markdale. We can see no great obstacle in the way of Thornbury people reaching this station direct, there being but one hill of any account, and it is not absolutely necessary to travel even that hill to reach this village. Every necessary convenience and accommodation will be provided at Markdale in the handling of freight, &c., should the Thornbury people decide on the proposed change.

R. T. OF T.

The Royal Templars concert, which was given in Rae's Hall on Tuesday evening was in every respect a success. The hall was well filled, and everything passed off with the best of order. The customary refreshments were dispensed with, much to the relief of the committee, and we believe, to the satisfaction of all. A substitute was, however, provided, in the shape of a supply of beautiful eating apples. Rev. Mr. Casson was voted to the chair, and the programme entered upon within six minutes of the stated hour; this was another important improvement, as it is very common to commence proceedings from half an hour to an hour later than the time advertised. The programme was ably rendered. A quartette by Mrs. Hill, Misses. Lyons and Armstrong, and Messrs. Brown and Armstrong, was rich. Mr. Porter is a good reciter and did his part admirably. Mr. Richards acquitted himself creditably. Mr. J. R. Anderson appeared in his usual happy mood. It is always a delight to a Markdale audience to have the privilege of listening to Mr. A., and they were by no means disappointed this time. Mr. H. A. Galbraith of Toronto gave two most thrilling recitations. He has a pleasing address, and an expressive and thrilling manner. W. J. Benson appeared in character, and brought the house down completely. He is a genius indeed, and did his part exceedingly well, keeping the audience in roars of laughter throughout his stay on the platform; was heartily encored, and gave an amusing episode, followed by a song, "Mr. Riley." There was also a duette by Misses. Armstrong and Lyons. Song by Misses Ford. Song by Nellie Wilson, also by Miss Wilson. An address by Rev. T. Grandy, and statistics, &c., of the order by Mr. Ennis. The whole was wound up by the singing of the National Anthem. The Flesherton people turned out in large numbers, showing, in a practical manner, the fraternal feeling existing between the brethren. We hope to be able to reciprocate.

Fire in Glenelg.—The house on Lot 8, Con. 3, N. D. R., Glenelg, lately bought by Mr. William Collier, and occupied by Mr. Jenkinson, was burned on Friday last. The fire was first noticed about eleven o'clock, while Mr. Jenkinson and his son were in the woods, there being nobody near but Mrs Jenkinson. The alarm was given, but when the neighbors arrived the flames had made too much headway to save the building, and they proceeded to remove the contents, most of which were saved. The building was a large frame partly finished. It will be quite a loss to Mr. Collier, as there was no insurance.—Grey Review.

The Duty of Farm Hands.

The following is the concise statment of the duties and liabilities of farm hands according to Canadian law: "When a farm hand hires for a stated time he is bound to do all necessary work on all occasions and legal holidays included. There is no stated length of time which constitutes a day's work on a farm. This is established by custom, and is usually considered to include feeding the stock and doing chores before 7 in the morning and after 6 in the evening. so that the day may be spent in the field work. A man receives pay and board on holidays as well as other days, should do his reasonable work on those days; otherwise it would be quiet as reasonable for his employer to say: "This is a holiday, and we do no work in the house and no meals will be prepared for you." It is better to have all these points settled when the man is hired and make part of the agreement, and so avoid all chances of dispute. A farm hand cannot claim extra pay for overwork, unless there is a special agreement, as extra time in harvest or haying or other emergencies go to offset the loss of time by bad weather. Nevertheless, an employeer can well afford to be liberal in this respect when work pushes.

Attempted Burglary.—About two o'clock on Tuesday morning last J. E. Richards and S. M. Smythe, two of W. J. McFarland's salesmen, who sleep in the store, were awakened by the growling of the big dog, who is also stationed in the premises at nights. They heard an effort made by parties outside to open the back door. The boys at once jumped, knocking a chair over in the dark, which it is supposed frightened the burglars. On opening the side door, two men were seen hurrying down Mill street from towards the store. Smythe fired three shots from a self-cocking 32 calibre revolver after them, but of course they were at too great a distance for the bullets to take effect.

FOR THE FARMER.

Feeding "Store Cattle."

One great specialty of agriculture is the breeding and feeding of beef cattle for market. The expert in this business has learned that there must be, for the highest profit, no standstill in the life of the beef animal. Where there is no growth, the food eaten is lost. All growth comes from the extra food; if only enough is given to support the animal, it must remain stationary, without any increase in weight or in value. A numerous class of farmers keep what they call "store" cattle through the cold season, in a standstill condition; and they do not seem to realize that they have been throwing away all the food consumed through the winter, because they have not given food enough to produce any growth. This ought to be so plain to them as not to need explanation. The store animal that makes no growth, is actually becoming less valuable because its capacity for digesting food becomes impaired, and it often takes a month, on good grass, to get these store cattle into a thrifty condition again. If these farmers would study this storing system carefully, they certainly would not repeat it. As we have often shown, it takes two-thirds of a full ration to keep the animal alive, without growth, and this is lost unless the other third is added, to produce a vigorous growth. It costs from $10 to $15 to store a steer through the winter, and if the farmer has ten head, his loss will be from $100 to $150; while had he fed $50 to $75 worth more of feed, the growth would have paid a profit on the whole feed. This system, then, shows a great want of foresight.—[National Live-Stock Journal, Chicago.

Fruit Garden in December.

Gather up all stakes, labels, boxes, and store whatever may be of future use, and make kindling wood of the rest. Surface drainage should be provided to carry off water from rains and thaws. Young trees planted last fall or spring, need a mound of earth at the base of the trunk, to steady them against the heavy blows, and also help to keep off mice. Cut cions in mild weather, always taking vigorous last season's shoots. Pack with sawdust and moss, first carefully labelling them. Strawberry beds if not yet protected, should be covered with straw, hog hay, or leaves. Prune in mild spells. currants, gooseberries, grapevines, etc. If trees or small fruits are to be planted next spring, decide upon kinds, where they are to be bought, and order early. Fruit, if stored in the house cellar in large quantities, may give off so much carbonic acid as to contaminate the air of the rooms above. Provide ventilation, connecting with a chimney if possible. Keep a thermometer in the fruit cellar to aid in maintaining a low temperature—just above freezing. Manure should be drawn to the orchard while the ground is frozen, ready for spreading in early spring. Gates and fences should be in condition to keep out animals. Rabbits are most readily kept from young trees, by sprinkling the trunks with blood. Set traps. The eggs of the tent caterpillar, which are glued to the twigs in a band near their ends, should be got off and destroyed.

Swine-Farming.

We are more and more impressed with the value of hogs on the farm. Many farmers make their cows the main feature; the buildings are constructed with reference to their management, and the rotation of crops is fixed to promote the same end. We also have farms devoted to horse breeding, and whole sections of country where sheep breeding is the leading industry. To make these different branches of husbandry a specialty, is the right course for success. In the great corn districts of the West, hogs are raised in large numbers, but we are forced to say, from observation, that it is generally corn, more than care, which gives the business its degree of success. Often enough corn is wasted if fed with care to fatten the entire stock. The western hog does not fill the entire place for which he was designed. He is simply a condensed corn crib, with a great many rat holes. This business basis may possibly answer where corn is cheap and land requires no fertilizer, but in the largest portion of this country corn is not so abundant that the farmer can afford to waste it, or is land so rich but that it can become more productive. Hogs should be made a factor of improvement on every farm. We should have swine farms the same as dairy horse and sheep farms, with the fields and buildings adapted to them. Hogs should be fed in the fields, with a rotation in their feeding grounds, the same as in crops. In this way, in a few years, the whole farm can be gone over, and every field enriched. There is room here for solid missionary work, both in improving the condition of the pigs and of the people.

Litter Swine Lightly.

There is but little danger of horses, cattle, and sheep being given too much litter; but where swine have a shelter that wards off winds and rains, and where the hogs are allowed to herd together, they require very little litter. Giving them too much is a common error, and is the source of nearly all the bronchial and pulmonary diseases which affect hogs in the late winter and enrly spring. The body of the hog is of such a nature, and these animals lie so close together, that if they, have for litter a poor conductor of heat they become overheated in the shelter and chilled when they come outside. But the liquid excrement of swine is too valuable to be lost, and they should be supplied with dry earth. This affords a convenient means of saving both solid and liquid excrement and does not lead to disease. When hogs rapidly foul their bed, the litter should be removed each morning and a new quantity supplied.

To be profitable, the litter must be properly composted. Build a four square pen of poles in any convenient situation, and place a roof over it that will effectually ward off the rain. Into this keep the mass level or lowest in the middle. There is no drainage from the pen, as there is a roof over it. Use enough litter to hold all the urine; it rots well, rarely requiring forking over before using. It is, however, easy to build another pen at one side, and throw the compost from one to the other. Frequently fork over the surface, going as deep as possible, scatter shelled corn over it and turn in the hogs being careful to turn them out as soon as they have done rooting. If the hogs do not go deep enough, make holes with a sharpened stick, and fill them with shelled corn. An enterprising hog will go to the bottom.

The Witch's Ring.

A curious, sleepy old village is Adlingtune. In the course of my ramblings in the old disused burial ground I found an old stone, and on it I read the words:

BARBARA CORNWALL.
BORN 1620, DIED 1680. AGE, 60 YEARS.
Lawfully executed for witchcraft.

I inquired of several persons as to the history of this woman. Finally I found an old woman who told me the story.

Old Barbara was tried, condemned, and hanged, protesting innocence to the last. The little money found in her possession was used to buy that gravestone; and to this day if anyone was bold enough to go to her grave at midnight on the same day of the year on which she was hanged and say: "Barbara, I believe you were innocent," at the same time stretching out a hand over the grave, she would appear to him and place in his hand a talisman.

This talisman would bring good fortune as long as he retained it, but at some time in his life the witch would return to claim her own.

I found myself almost unconsciously wandering back through the old burial ground to the witch's grave. Carelessly glancing at the inscription, I was surprised to find that very day was the 200th anniversary of her death.

The world was wild and weird that night when I stole forth from the village. Climbing the low stone wall, I made my way to that dark, dreary corner where the old witch reposed. By and by the village clock tolled twelve. Mechanically I strove to speak the words I had been told, but my lips refused to form a sound.

Still I stood, in that awful, black silence, chilled with fear, until with a mighty effort I reached out my arm over the grave and grasped—a hand.

It was only for an instant—not that, for it was jerked away in a twinkling—but long enough to feel how warm and velvety it was, and how very small. I cleared the old wall at a bound and was out on the moonlit road, walking toward town. The touch of those fingers thrilled me as with an electric shock. Gradually the consciousness forced itself upon me that I held something in my clenched hands—a ring set with a flashing stone. On reaching my room at the little inn I sat down and examined the ring.

It was curiously carved and massive. The setting was composed of several small colored stones set in a circle about a large diamond, the name inside, "Barbara."

Fortune smiled upon me from that night. Two years of busy life had passed and old Barbara's talisman was still unreclaimed.

Do you believe in love at first sight? Well, if the first appearance of Walter Wynam's sister had not conquered me the touch of her hand when she welcomed her brother's friend would have enslaved me for ever. Never had a touch so thrilled me since—since I held the witch's hand in the graveyard. The same peculiar shock passed through me, and the memory of that spectral night came over me like a flash.

The end came about through my asking the young lady if she believed in ghosts.

"I suppose I should," said she, laughing, "considering my experience."

I implored an explanation, and she related the following story:

It was about two years ago when a party of girls, just home from school, were visiting a friend down in the country. One of the girls had heard a foolish story about a witch's grave, and some nonsense about her annual appearance and a talisman, and when I expressed my incredulity they braved me to put it to the test. What is the matter? The place? A little town called Adlingtune.

"Foolishly I accepted their challenge, and received a terrible fright. I carried out the instructions, and stretched my hand out over her grave. It was so dark I could see nothing, but some one seized my hand. I was so benumbed with fear that I could not cry out, but could only fly through the lonely graveyard to where my trembling companions were awaiting me in the field. It was a foolish adventure, for I felt ill, and it cost me a valuable ring which was left me by my poor Aunt Barbara. 'For her little namesake,' she said, when she sent it across the sea to me. You see, the ring was a little large for my finger, and was pulled off by—by——"

"By me," I interrupted, taking the lost ring from my pocket.

It was time for Barbara (I forgot to say that was her name) to be startled now. I told my story, and, finally, not only offered to return the ring but to give myself into the bargain. She took both.

The administration of government, like a guardianship, ought to be directed to the good of those who confer, and not to those who receive the trust.

TOPICS FOR WOMEN.

ADDRESSED TO MOTHERS.

Bear in mind that you are largely responsible for your child's inherited character.

If you have lost a child, remember that for the one that is gone there is no more to do; for those remaining, everything.

Make your boys and girls study physiology; when they are ill try and make them understand why, how the complaint arose, and the remedy, as far as you know it.

Impress upon them from early infancy that actions have results, and that they cannot escape consequences even by being sorry when they have acted wrongly.

Respect their little secrets; if they have concealments, worrying them will never make them tell, and time and patience will probably do their work.

Allow them, as they grow older, to have opinions of their own; make them individuals, and not mere echoes.

Find out what their special tastes are and develop them, instead of spending time, money and patience in forcing them into studies that are repugnant to them.

Take your children yourself, if you can, to places of amusement; let them associate you with their enjoyment; when they are parents themselves the memory of it will influence them in their treatment of their children. For their sakes, enjoy life with them if possible; clouds will come soon enough.

If you say no, mean no. Unless you have a good reason for changing a given command, hold to it.

Take an interest in your children's pleasure, mother's participation is a great delight.

Remember that trifles to you are mountains to them; respect their feelings.

Keep up a standard of principles; your children will be your keenest judges in the future.

Be honest with them in small things as well as in great. If you cannot tell them what they wish to know, say so rather than deceive them.

WOMEN IN A SLEEPER.

There are more hatreds engendered between women on sleeping cars than anywhere on earth unless it be in a church. Suppose there are a dozen women in a sleeper and one toilet room. Passengers are awakened say an hour before the train arrives at its destination. The first woman who gets into that toilet room will lock the door and stay in there until she has made as elaborate a toilet as she would at home, while the other eleven women are waiting, with their hair in one hand and hairpins in the other, and satchel on their arms, and they hate the woman in the room. When she comes out the one with the most gall gets in the room next, and though she has talked outrageously about the one who went in first, she stays quite as long, until the other ten women hate her worse than they did the first. The ten ladies who are waiting will by this time have concluded that there is no show for them, and they will try and fix up so they can go to a hotel before making their toilet. The only two who will be fixed up will be those who have been hoggish, crowded in and remained regardless of the comfort of others. Many ladies who travel on sleepers never try to get in the toilet room in the morning, because there is always one or two who have seemed to lay awake all night in order to make a rush on the wash room before anybody else. Some ladies who travel a good deal can pick out the one, the night before, who will monopolize the toilet room in the morning. There is a demand for apartments, certainly, in sleepers, where women can be comfortable and at their ease without annoying each other. They do not annoy men, because men can go in the wash room and "register on the towel," put on a clean collor and pair of cuffs and make room for a cartload of dirty passengers.

How a Chinaman Gets into Business.

Wong Ching Foo, the Chinese ex-journalist, tells how his countrymen get into business in America. He says; "One of my race arrives here with no money and in debt to his friends or to bankers for the steamer and railroad fair. He generally engages himself as a greenhorn or apprentice to some successful laundryman. Although the compensation is small ($4 or $5 per week and board), for the six months or one year of his contract, he learns the business, pays off his debts, and gains a good name for integrity and capability. At the end of his term, if he is a skilled workman, he can either secure first-class wages ($18 per week), or open a laundry of his own. The latter is his usual course. He may see, for example, a laundry for sale for $600, whose looks and location he likes, and he himself has but $50 to his name. He goes to Mott street and there on the bulletin boards puts up a notice calling for a "whey," or syndicate of twelve men with $50 each to meet him at a certain time and place. The meeting is had, and if he be regarded as honest and capable the requisite $550 is given to him, he in return acknowledging the indebtedness, and promising to pay a certain interest on the money advanced (generally 20 per cent. per annum). This money is paid back in monthly instalments, so that at the end of a year the borrower is free from debt, his credit unimpaired and the laundry absolutely his own."

To enter safely into the married state, the contracting parties should understand human nature, and above all, their own dispositions, and then compare them frankly and candidly.

How A Great Industry Arose.

We shall soon hear how long paper in progress, when it nearly extinguished the cotton flour sack manufacture; but necessity was never more truly the Mother of Invention, than the war was the cause of the making of the paper flour sacks at that time.

Cotton was not king, as had been written across the length and breadth of the land; paper was found to be a substitute better and cheaper than cotton itself. As energetic as the firm of Arkell & Smiths had been in extending their business at the start, they still had unused resources of mind and energy to attack the paper problem and bring it to a highly successful solution.

From 1863 to 1865 the manufacture and trade in cotton sacks had almost wholly dried up, and this firm, seeing clearly that its business was fraying down to more than a ragged edge, commenced a series of experiments in several paper mills, to produce a power of the requisite toughness and tensile strength to bear the abrasion and strain incident to the transportation of flour. The paper grocery bag was then just coming into use, but the paper of which it was, and is still made, is so tender and fragile that i would have been useless for anything except the lightest contents, and for the shortest transportation.

Every known and available fibre was tested—Australian and Spanish grasses, Canadian wild rice straw, Kentucky hemp, Northern flax, Hindu jute, manilla, linen waste, and many others.

No material gave such strength as the manilla used in the manufacture of rope and cordage. This material however, was so obdurate and kinking that the first sheets of paper made from it would roll themselves up as snug as a watch-spring, and it was only after months of chemical persuasion and mechanical castigation, that this contrariness was overcome. This paper was found to have a surprising tensile strength, for an inch ribbon of it sustained a weight of one hundred and twenty pounds. Some of the bag paper now made is strong enough to hold toward two hundred pounds on an inch ribbon. The same size strip of cotton cloth gives way at twenty-eight pounds.

Manilla, however, was found too costly, being worth in those days sixteen cents per pound in gold, with gold at 210, and it required two pounds of the fibre, exclusive of the chemicals, to make a pound of paper. Manilla could not be cheapened, for, though the labor employed in getting the fibre was excessively cheap, the distance of the transportation from the Philippine Islands could not be shortened, and the material was too expensive for an ecomical paper material. It was not long, however, before it was found that old manilla rope, that had been used in rigging on water craft, had all the requisite strength, and was cheap enough, while a large part of the stickiness of the new fibre was worked out of it by the usage. So the old rope, that paper-makers had hitherto considered a nuisance, and thrown away, was utilized for the new paper flour sack.

This manilla stock is made into the desired paper by a peculiar process of felting. The rope is cut into lengths of three or four inches, and beaten out while dry into a mass that looks like the hair of a mattress; it is then boiled in limewater, beaten for hours in great pounders, whose iron ribs comb out the fibres without mashing them, and then, by one step after another, it is carried floating in water to the face of revolving wires, where it is tucked up against their moving faces, all woven, tangled and interlaced, and so passes upon a continuous moving belt of flannel, where another soppy, wet sheet, made in the same way, joins it, and the two, now beginning to unite, are passed under and over a long double row of steam calenders, which squeeze out the water, dry and pack the fibres tightly together, till at last the hairy-looking pulp that surged out at one end of the machine like a foamy sea, is rolled up at the other end in big drums of paper weighing four hundred and fifty pounds to the roll. —[Paper World.

A Dog's Devotion.

"I had only got my harvest done when one night I awoke to find my room brightly illuminated. I understood its meaning at once and made all haste to dress and get my wallet of money, nearly $3,000, and get out of the cabin. It was as I suspected, the dreaded prairie fire. Away in the horizon I could notice its rapid advance. I knew that my only way of escape was in hasty flight. My horse was roaming over the prairie, and I could not afford to look for him, so along with my faithful dog I plodded my way as rapidly as possile towards the Bow River. The distance was ten miles, and whether I could make it or not I did not take time to consider, but ran as I never did before. How I lasted the distance is a problem to me. I reached the bank of the river as the raging flames were within a hundred yards, and as I was standing there, dazed my dog took hold of me and with a sudden jerk pulled me head-foremost into the river. The cool waters revived me and I stayed there until the flames leaped the river and were licking the dry grass on the other side. Several buffalo were in the river, having been driven by the flames. I had no home any more and knew not what to do. I wanted to go back and look at the place where my home was, but I knew there was nothing there for me any more. Then the first thought dawned on me that I had no means of sustenance, not even a firearm to assist me in securing game. I started down the river, intending to keep by its course until I reached the Saskatchewan, thus making sure of something to drink if nothing to eat. The route was a good deal the longest, but the safest, and I plodded on. That night I was tired and hungry when I laid down to rest. Strange to say I slept sound and awoke with a prodigious appetite. To appease it my dog had a fine prairie rabbit lying in front of me. He had not touched it himself after killing it, but by the wishful way he watched the dead animal I knew he was as hungry as myself. I shared with him and continued on my way. I reached Fort Walsh in five days after, my dog always having something fresh each morning that would last us the rest of the day."—[St. Paul Day.

A CURE FOR HUMAN PASSIONS.

What a Homœopathic Physician Proposes to do in Science.

A physician of the Homœopathic school at Lyons professes, seriously, to have discovered a remedy for human passions—those moral diseases, such as envy, hatred, malice, anger, jealousy, obstinacy, avarice, etc., which render so many homes unhappy. On a pamphlet to show "How homœopathy may improve the character of man and develop his intelligence," he gives some wonderful instances of the cures alleged to have been affected by his special treatment, which he declares to be infallible.

In one case a suspicious, jealous, and violent husband, who ill-treated his wife for a period of sixteen years, was cured, unconsciously to himself, by a few globules of nux vomica dropped quietly into his broth, and his wife was soon delighted to hear him humming some operatic airs and addressing her as "cherie," "ma pouponie," etc. After a few days' experience of this regime the terrible Bartholo was transformed into the tenderest of husbands. By a skilful alternation of other mendicaments a rascally husband was corrected of his inherent faults and wilful outbursts of anger. A miserly father, on being subjected to a few doses of calcarea carbonica, gave his consent to his daughter's marriage, which he had previously resisted. By the same medicine, varied in its preparation, a young student who was backward in mathematics was enabled to master the science without further study. The calcarea carbonica, it will be noted, cured a miser and a dolt—both suffering from the tyranny of sums and figures.

The Lyons physician has an antidote for everything; nux vomica for jealousy; sulphur for drunkenness, salicea for obstinacy, arsenica album for malice, and belladonna for imbecility. Those patients who do not happen to be laboring under these infirmities, and for whom the remedies just mentioned might be prescribed for other ailments, will probably protest against their use. But unhappy partners, who believe in the efficacy of this latest application of the science of homœopathy, may be tempted to resort to it as a means of avoiding a divorce, and certain husbands invoke its aid against their mothers-in-law.

ROUGH BUT NOBLE.

How a Western Man Found a Relative by a Courteous Act.

"You will have to go into the forward coach," said the conductor, as he tore off a coupon from a second-class ticket.

"But the tobacco smoke is so bad and I have such a headache," said the little woman timidly, and the pale face was raised pleadingly.

"Can't help it, ma'am. Rules of the road require passengers having second-class tickets to ride in the forward coach," was the uncompromising reply, as he passed on.

"Hang your rules!" blurted out a big man with a fierce mustache.

"Stay where you are, madam. You look tired; here let me turn this seat over so you can lie down. Put your head on this grip. Here's my overcoat; put put it so," and he had her nicely tucked away before she could object.

"Your ticket? All O.K. Take mine; it's to the same place, first-class, unlimited. I love to smoke. Always ride in the smoker anyhow." And he went forward. Dinner was announced in the dining-car, and the big man came bustling in and insisted on her having dinner. She objected, evidently thinking it improper to receive so much attention from a stranger. "Kate Adams," read the big man, looking at the name on her valise.

"Not Dick Adams's wife? You are! Well, by——! Why, come here, I'll kiss you, my girl. Dick's my youngest brother. Well, I'll be——? Well, well. Why, I was just going out to see him. Heard he'd got flat broke and kind o' want to set him up again."

And the big man looked so happy and the little sister-in-law so pleased that the passengers forgot to kill the "straw" lunatic that was taking a vote of the passengers on the presidential question for a daily.

Fifteen Hundredweight of Gunpowder to a Charge.

The gun which Colonel Hope is making for the British War Office is to be, it appears, a 100 ton gun, firing the enormous and unprecedented charge of 15 cwt. (three quarters of a ton!) of powder concentrated behind a 1,200 lb. shell in a 12-inch gun. We hear that the calculated velocity is upwards of 4,000 feet a second, and the theoretical penetration through wrought iron about 5 feet. Assuming this gun to be a success, it would have a value beyond that of other guns, because owing to the immense range and penetration, it would afford such protection to our harbors and coaling stations that it would set free a large number of ships for their legitimate work of cruising which otherwise would be compelled to remain in port. We hear that Colonel Hope expects to finish his first gun in ten or twelve months, including the time necessary for the construction of the enormous plant required; but as he makes his guns in one single forging, the actual construction of the gun itself is not expected to take quite three months.

What his Recently Published Letters to the War Office Say.

Among the batch of letters to and from General Gordon in the Soudan, published by the English War Office, are the following of more than unusual popular interest:—

GENERAL GORDON TO SIR E. BARING AND NUBAR PACHA.

KHARTOUM, July 30, 1884.

Your telegram of the 5th May, 1884, received. Thanks for kind expressions. Nile now high, and we hope to open route to Sanaar in a few days. We have had no serious losses. Stewart was slightly wounded in arm near Palaco; he is all right now. Be assured that these hostilities are far from being sought for, but we have no option, for retreat is impossible unless we abandon civil employees and their families, which the general feeling of troops is against. I have no advice to give. If we open Sanaar and clear Blue Nile will be strong enough to take Berber—that is, if Dongola still holds out. As for Mahdi, he will not send succour here: Not one pound of the money you gave me got here; it was captured at Berber. We want £200,000 sent to Kassala. The expenses of these garrisons must be met. Khartoum costs £500 per diem. If route gets open to Kassala, I shall send Stewart there with journal—that is, if he will consent to go. You may rely on this that if there was any possible way of avoiding the wretched fighting I should adopt it, for the whole war is hateful to me. The people refuse to let me go out on expeditions, owing to the bother which would arise if anything happened, so I sit on tenter hooks of anxiety. If I could make any one chief here I would do it, but it is impossible, for all the good men were killed with Hicks. To show you that Arabs fire well, two of our steamers received 970 and 860 shots in their hulls respectively. Since our defeat on the 16th of March, 1884, we had only thirty killed, 50 or 60 wounded, which is very little. I should think we have fired

HALF A MILLION CARTRIDGES.

The conduct of the people and troops has been excellent. I was thinking of issuing a proclamation liberating the slaves of those in arms, but have deferred doing so for fear of complication. I have great trust that God will bring us out triumphantly, and with no great loss on either side. We have queer stories as to the fall of Berber. Arabs captured there all Stewart's Hussar uniforms, and my medals, etc. It may be bad taste to say it, but if we get out of this give Stewart a K. C. M. G. and spare me at all costs. You will thus save me the disagreeableness of having to refuse, but I hate those things. If we get out it is in answer to prayer, and not by our might, and it is a true pleasure to have been here, though painful enough at times. Stewart's journal is copious. I only hope it will get down to you when I send it. Land mines are the things for defence in future; we have covered the works with them, and they have deterred all attacks and done much execution. Since the 30th March, 1884, date of your Cairo depatch, we have had no news from you. Seyd Mahomet Osman, of Kassala, ought to be the route for your despatches, and you ought to give him a present of £500 for he saved Khartoum. We have made a decoration with three degrees, silver gilt, silver, pewter, with inscription "Siege of Khartoum," with a grenade in centre. School children and woman have also received one; consequently I am very popular with the black ladies of Khartoum. We have issued paper notes to the amount of £26,000, and borrowed £50,000 from merchants, which you will have to meet. I have sent in addition £8,000 paper notes to Senaar. What Kassala is doing for money I do not know. Of course, we only get taxes paid in lead, so you are running a good bill up here. The troops and people are full of heart; I cannot say the same for all the Europeans. The Arabs are in poor heart. I should say that about 2,000 determined men alone keep them in the field. I expect it will end in

A TERRIBLE FAMINE

throughout the land. Spy yesterday stated the Queen of England had arrived at Koroska. Perhaps it is a steamer. The only reinforcements the Soudan has received since 27th November, 1883, date when Hicks' defeat was known at Cairo, is seven persons, including myself, and we have sent down over 600 soldiers and 2,000 people. The people here and Arabs laugh over it. I shall not leave Khartoum until I can put some one in. If the Europeans like to go to the Equator I will give them steamers, but I will not leave these people after all they have gone through. As for routes, I have told you that the one from Wady Halfa, along right bank of Nile to Berber, is the best, and this, had not Berber fallen, would have been a picnic. The other route is from Senhit to Kassala, and Abou Harason Blue Nile, which would be safe up to Kassala, but I fear it is too late. We must fight it out with our means. If blessed by God, we shall succeed; if not His will, so be it. The main thing is to send money to Kassala Where is Wood? Kind regards to him and Generals Stephenson and Graham. Why write in cypher? It is useless, for Arabs have no interpreter. You say your feeling is to abandon Soudan; so be it, but before you do that you must take down Egyptian population, and this the Arabs do not see. According to all accounts, 5,000 men were massacred at Berber. All is for the best. I will conclude by saying that we will defend ourselves to the last; that I will not leave Khartoum; that I will try to persuade all Europeans to escape; and that I am still sanguine that, by some means not clear, God will give us an issue. What was the result of your negotiations for opening road Suakim to Berber? The Arabs captured the money (you gave me) at Berber, but it is the only money which the Egyptian pachas have ground out of the Soudan since their occupation.—(Signed) C. G. GORDON.

P. S.—July 31, 1884.—Reading over your telegram of the 5th May, 1884, you ask me "to state causes and intention in staying at Khartoum, knowing Government means to abandon Soudan," and, in answer, I say I stay at Khartoum because Arabs have shut us up and will not let us out. I also add that even if the road was opened the people would not let me go unless I gave them some government or took them with me, which I could not do. No one would leave more willingly than I would if it was possible.—C. G. G.

GENERAL GORDON TO SIR E. BARING.

KHARTOUM, July 31st, 1884.

We continue, thank God, to drive Arabs back up Blue Nile, and hope to open road to Senaar in eight days or less, and to recapture small arms lost by Salah Bey. We then hope to send an expedition to surprise and recapture Berber. It is a sind qua non that you send me Zebehr otherwise my stay here is indefinite. And you should send £50,000 to Dongola to be forwarded to Berber if we take it. River begins to fall in, say, four months. Before that time you must either let the Soudan take back the Soudan or send Zebehr with a subsidy yearly. (D. V.) We will send down to Berber to take it with the Egyptian troops here, so that they will be on their way home, and I shall send Stewart. We hope (D. V.) to recapture the two steamers which were lost at Berber on its fall. The Equator and Bahr Gazelle provinces can be (D. V.) relieved later on, and their troops brought here. As to Darfur, it must be afterwards thought of, for we do not know if it still holds out. As for Kordofan, I hope and believe the Mahdi has his hands full. I could vacate Senaar if it was possible, but I do not think it is, and also the moral effect of its evacuation would be fatal to our future interests, while we have no food to feed the refugee people who would come here. You will see if we open road to Senaar from here to cut the Arab movement in two by Blue Nile. I repeat I have no wish to retain this country. My sole desire is to restore the prestige of the Government in order to get our garrisons and to put some ephemeral government in position in order to get away.—(Signed) C. G. GORDON.

A Water Pipe Shock.

A singular occurrence, which is stated to have recently taken place at Ithaca, N. Y., illustrates the dangers attendant upon the universal introduction of electricity. As a lady was turning on the water from the faucet over the sink in her kitchen, using her right hand, her left being in contact with the iron lining of the sink, she was suddenly prostrated by a severe shock. Her impression was that she had been stricken with paralysis or apoplexy, but a physician who was summoned found that the inside of the thumb of the left hand had been blistered in several places. This led him to believe that she had received a strong electric shock from some source. A few minutes subsequently the lady's daughter, in drawing water from the same faucet, was similarly affected, though not so severely. The family then became convinced that the trouble existed in the water pipe and sink. The manager of the Telephone Exchange, after a brief examination of the premises, found the secret of the trouble. The residence was connected with the Ithaca Hotel by a "dead" private telegraph wire. This wire had been crossed with the electric light wire. The "dead" wire was connected with the metallic roof on the dwelling house, which in turn was connected by a tin water conductor with the water pipe leading to the sink. When the dynamo machine of the electric light company was in operation, the current passed over the "dead" wire to the tin roof, and thence to the water pipe. It needed only the completion of the circuit by some person drawing water.

Care and Caution.

A man may be too careful, and too cautious; but the reverse is much more apt to be the case. When care and caution are the result as well as the cause of mature deliberation, they are to be commended by all means. It is the man who looks carefully over the whole ground, who looks at all sides of the question, thus exercising care and caution, and who then acts, if he acts at all, with decision and tenacity, who is eminently successful. And otherwise a man cannot act steadily and perseveringly; he who rushes to action, hasty and inconsiderate, will be just as erratic and inconstant in his movements. It is a popular opinion that in this country we must act upon the spur of the moment, and that care and caution are factors better discarded. This is most assuredly a mistake. Where the hurly-burly of life is greatest, there is the most need of being careful and considerate.

A Biblical critic of British extraction corrects what he styles a stupid perversion of sense. For "hewers of wood and drawers of water" he would read "drawers of wood and ewers of water." Nobody, he justly says, ever saw a bureau with drawers of water, or a bedroom pitcher made of wood.

"Smith, didn't you tell me you sometimes wrote for the paper?" "Yes, I did." "It's strange I never saw any of your articles in print." "Oh, they never publish them. You see, I don't mind telling you, the editor told me confidentially that my articles were so solid he used them for paper weights."

What is Catarrh?

From the Mail (Can.) Dec. 15th.

Catarrh is a muco-purulent discharge caused by the presence and development of the vegetable parasite amoeba in the internal lining membrane of the nose. This parasite is only developed under favorable circumstances, and these are:—Morbid state of the blood, as the blighted corpuscle of tubercle, the germ poison of syphilis, mercury, toxoemea, from the retention of the effete matter of the skin, suppressed perspiration, badly ventilated sleeping apartments, and other poisons that are germinated in the blood. These poisons keep the internal lining membrane of the nose in a constant state of irritation, ever ready for the deposits of the seeds of these germs, which spread up the nostrils and down the fauces, or back of the throat, causing ulceration of the throat; up the eustachian tubes, causing deafness; burrowing of the vocal cords, causing hoarseness, usurping the proper structure of the bronchial tubes, ending in pulmonary consumption and death.

Many attempts have been made to discover a cure for this distressing disease by the use of inhalants and other ingenious devices, but none of these treatments can do a particle of good until the parasites are either destroyed or removed from the mucus tissue.

Some time since a well-known physician of forty years standing, after much experimenting, succeeded in discovering the necessary combination of ingredients which never fails in absolutely and permanently eradicating this horrible disease, whether standing for one or forty years. Those who may be suffering from the above disease should, without delay, communicate with the business managers, Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King Street West, Toronto, and get full particulars and treatise free by enclosing stamp.

Where Women Start the Fires.

Among the tribes of Africa the care of the fire is entrusted to the oldest unmarried daughter of the chief, or, if he has no such daughter, to the maiden nearest related to him. If by an accident or misfortune, it is extinguished, it must not be relit from another, but must be made anew from the beginning. For this purpose two straight sticks of any readily burning wood are taken. A hollow is made in one of the sticks, in which the sharpened end of the other one may be twirled, and some punk or half rotten wood is put in a grove cut to hold it, to serve as tinder. This stick is held to the ground by the knees, while the other one is turned rapidly back and forth between the open hands. When a spark appears, it is directed upon the tinder, which is then readily blown into a flame. The natives dislike this work very much, and when on a journey if they have no other fire apparatus they take an ignited stick with them, the fire of which they skillfully keep glowing for a long time.—[Popular Science Monthly.

SAW MILL AND TIMBER LAND FOR SALE OR TO LET

In the Township of Artemesia, County of Grey, 4 miles from Flesherton Station, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The mill is situated at Little Falls, in a block of about 400 acres timber land, with other timber land surrounding. The building is substantially built on stone foundation. The machinery is all good and driven with great power by a 23 inch Leffell wheel, under 36 ft. head of water. There are one large circular saw for cutting logs, 2 small circulars for sawing lath and broom handles, 1 guage lathe for turning broom handles, etc., 1 shingle machine with jointer and packer complete. The water power is excellent, the stream being very regular. There are several other good mill sites on the proyerty. The land in the valley is considered the best in the country. The place would make an excellent stock farm when the timber is taken off.

This offers a good opportunity for a practical, energetic man to go into this kind of business, as the place will be sold or let on liberal terms.

The bush is so convenient to the mill logs can be trucked in summer time. Immediate possession given.

The World's Exhibition which is to open at New Orleans on December 1st and continue till the 31st of May, is now attracting a great deal of attention. The main building covers thirty-three, acres, and is the largest ever erected, exceeding in size the Crystal Palace in Sydenham, and being nearly double the size of the main building at the Centennial. Through some oversight, the Canadian Government was not asked to take part in the exhibition till a couple of weeks ago, and as there was not time to get up a creditable display it has been decided not to attempt any.

Draft Horses.—40 Years Experience.

A. S. Chamberlain, for 40 years proprietor of the Bull's Head Stables, New York City, in reference to the value of different breeds of draft horses, said:

"I keep exchange and sale stables for horses. Don't deal on my own account to any extent. All classes of horses, amounting to several thousands annually, come to my stables from all sections of the country. A large number of these are draft horses of the different breeds the Clydesdales, the French horses called Percherons or Normans, the English and Belgian. There seems to be a larger demand for the French horses than for any other breed.

"Some years ago we used to get a great many horses from Upper Canada. These were Clydesdales, and would weigh from 1,400 to 1,600 pounds, but they did not seem to answer the purpose; as a general thing their feet were thinshelled and flat, and being heavy horses their feet would become sore and would not stand the pavements. The French horses have good feet and stand the pavements better than the Clydesdales. That is the reason they sell better

"I would advise the farmers and breeders who are breeding horses to sell on the New York market for draft purposes to breed from the French horses in preference to all others."
—Chicago Tribune.

The best horses to be found in France are recorded with pedigrees in full in the Percheron Stud Book of that country.

At the great importing and breeding establishment of M. W. Dunham, Wayne, DuPage Co., Illinois, hundreds of the finest specimens of this famous race can be found at all times.

Horse Physiognomy.

A horse's head indicates his character very much as a man's does. Vice is shown in the eye and mouth; intelligence in the eye and in the breadth between the ears, and between the eyes; spirit in the eye and nose, in the mobile nostril, and active ear. the size of the eye, the thinness of the skin, making the face bony, the large, open, thinedged nostril, the fine ear, and the thin, fine mane and fore-top, are indications of high breeding, and accompany a high-strung nervous organization, which with good limbs and muscular power, ensures a considerable degree of speed in the animal. The stupidly, lazy horse, that drivers call a "lunk-head," has a dull eye usually, a narrow forehead, and contracted poll. He is not represented in this groupe, but occurs not frequently is always a blunderer, forgets himself, and stumbles on smooth ground, gets himself and his owner into difficulties, balks himself, is sometimes positively lazy, but often a hard goer. He needs constant care and watchfulness on the driver's part. A buyer of equine flesh should be able to detect the good and bad qualities of the animals he contemplates purchasing. This valuable knowledge is only acquired by a careful study of the various parts of horse physiognomy.—COL. M. C. WELD, in American Agriculturist for Dec.

NELLO.

THE STORY OF MY LOVE.

CHAPTER XIX.

When Alice heard Lord Saxon's words —and they sounded with terrible distinctness in the quiet room—she started with a faint cry, and then fell back white and helpless. After a few moments she stood up, having recovered her composure.

"You cannot mean that, Nello!" she cried. "You cannot leave me; we cannot part! I am your promised wife. Look at me," she continued, in frenzied despair—"look into the face that you have found so fair, and tell me that your love is still mine? You must not leave me to desolation and death! Look at me whom you have professed to love, and whisper your forgiveness. Nello, would you plunge a dagger into my heart?"

"Need you ask, Alice?" he answered.

"Well, you will kill me far more cruelly if you leave me bereft of your love," she said. "Oh, Nello, Nello, if you must send me from you, kill me here and now! I would rather die by your hand than receive life from another."

A simple dignity, such as I had not seen before, came to him now.

"My dear," he said, in gentle yet firm tones, "you must see that it is impossible I can ever marry you. Your beauty took me by storm, and I gave you as deep and passionate love as man ever gave to woman. It came to me like a vision of perfect bliss; it died when I found that you had been to me a living lie. I would have married you had you been poor as the beggar-girl whom King Cophetua loved; I would have married you had your beauty been marred by burn or scar. But you have on your soul a stain so horrible to me that your beauty could never hide it from my eyes."

With a cry to Heaven for pity, she again sank upon the couch, whilst Lord Saxon went on, in a grave, sad voice—

"Do not think me harsh—do not think that I judge you from a pinnacle of self-complacent goodness. I humble myself before Heaven for my many faults and sins while I speak to you. There are transgressions much greater than yours in the eyes of the world which I could more easily have forgiven; but a lie has always been to me the thing most hateful on earth. Had you told me all," he went on, "when I first declared my love for you—had you trusted to my affection, and shown me that, after all, a love of truth reigned in your soul, I would have made you my wife. But the lie you have acted and lived has been found out by another. I never before appreciated," he added, "the moral beauty of a woman. Beauty pales before the grandeur of nobility of soul, even as the twinkling stars are outshone by the sun of noonday."

I could listen to no more, but stood up to defend the beautiful yet unhappy woman who was writhing beneath the words of contempt that he poured forth.

"Do not be so terribly hard, so bitterly cruel, Lord Saxon!" I cried. "You may need mercy yourself, some day. If she has sinned, she suffers."

"And I suffer," he returned. "My life is as hopelessly shattered as is hers. I have loved, not a real, but an ideal woman whose soul, I believed, was clear as crystal. The ideal has vanished; and the reality that remains is but the dross of common humanity. Oh, Alice, why, when you knew that I loved you—why did you not tell me yourself of the deceit you were practising? Your honesty in telling me would have gone far towards atoning for your crime. As it is, you have been simply found out."

She rose from the couch and approached Lord Saxon. The pallor of death was on her face. As she flung herself upon her knees at his feet she looked at him with a pathetic yearning I shall never forget to the day of my death.

"Forgive me, Nello," she pleaded—and her voice might have touched a heart of stone—"forgive me! I did wrong, and I have suffered throughout the whole period of my deception. Oh, Nello, forgive me, and take me to your heart! I will be such a faithful wife to you—all the more faithful and truthful because I have deceived you. Nello, never again in this world shall my lips open to utter one false word—never again!"

"My dear," he said, "you only torture yourself and me. The soul has gone from my love; there is but the corpse of it left—nothing can reanimate it. I must be able to look up to the woman I take for a wife, to honor and reverence her. How could I reverence you when I know you to have committed a fraud? I will befriend you, I will take care of you; but my love is dead."

"Felicia," she cried, "plead for me! If he leaves me thus I shall die!" The tears were raining down her face, and her anguish was pitiable to see. "Plead for me, Felicia; he will listen to you."

"Be kinder to her, Lord Saxon," I said. "Do you not see that you are breaking her heart? And, with all her faults, you ought to remember that she has loved you devotedly."

"She has indeed," he answered, with a sad look on his face. "I wish it were all different, for I shall never know happiness again."

She rose and put both her arms round his neck, and whispered words of love to him. She kissed him and caressed his face with her little white trembling hands.

"My own love, my dear love," she murmured, "you could not, you must not, leave me without your love."

But he was deaf to her entreaties, and the caresses which but a few hours before would have filled him with delight now were repugnant to him.

"I repent," she cried to him—"oh, Nello, I repent so bitterly! Heaven pities a repentant sinner. Cannot you, beloved, forgive this my great sin?"

"I do," he replied. "It is not that. [illegible] to-morrow [illegible] will [illegible] your future and your mother."

"Apart from you?" she said.

"Yes—apart from me, my dear—quite apart."

"To-morrow, Nello?" she questioned, looking at him with a strange smile. "You will settle my future to-morrow?"

"Yes, my dear," he said. "Now rest."

"To-morrow," she repeated, with the same strange brooding smile on her face. "Kiss me once more, Nello—once more. Forget that my lips have lied to you, and remember only that I have loved you. You are quite sure that nothing can induce you to take me back to your heart again—you are quite sure?"

"I am quite sure," he replied slowly.

"Kiss me just once again then, and say good-bye. Oh, the happy hours that we have spent, the love that has been between us, Nello! Mine was a great fault, a wicked deed; but you must always remember that my repentance was terrible. I see there is no mercy for me. You have none; Heaven will have none. I have finished. But you will say good-bye, Nello, and you will always remember my terrible repentance."

I never saw such yearning love and tenderness as then came into Lord Saxon's face.

Notwithstanding all his shrinking from her, she went up to him again. There was no supplication in her voice now; a quiet resignation had come over her.

"Good-bye, Nello!" she said. "My dear lost love, good-bye!"—and then, wringing her hands with a gesture of utter despair, she went from the room.

"Her heart will break," I said. "Oh, Nello, forgive her!"

"Do you not think that my heart is torn with grief and pain?" he asked. "Felicia, I loved her so well that I think I could have forgiven her anything except the base deceit that she has been guilty of."

Then Lord Saxon joined the Major. They were together for half an hour; and, when they were leaving, the Major expressed to me his great sorrow at what had occurred. He added that, in the distressing circumstances, he would not remain in the house; and, as Lord Saxon had asked him to stay at Dunroon, he had decided to accept his hospitality.

They arranged to return to Jesmond Dene on the following afternoon, and meanwhile they would telegraph to Mr. Benson to meet them without delay. Everything was to be done quietly, so as to give Alice as little pain as possible.

"No publicity!" said the Major. "It is an unfortunate business altogether; but we must screen her."

When I had said good-night to them, I repaired at once to Aunt Annette's room. I did not tell her anything of what had passed, as I feared it would greatly excite her and perhaps retard her already slow recovery.

Before retiring for the night, I went to Alice's room and asked if she would like me to stay with her for an hour or two. The answer came in a strange smothered voice—"No;" she would rather be alone.

CHAPTER XX., AND LAST.

Towards four in the morning she whom I had known as Gabrielle, Lady Jesmond, entered my room. Her face was quite colourless, and her long golden tresses hung loosely over her shoulders; her eyes shone with a light that was almost terrible in its brightness. She came towards me, holding a letter in her hand.

"I could not sleep," she said, "and I have written this. Felicia, you have been kind to me from the first; will you render me a great service?"

"I will if I can," I replied

"You can if you will. I want you to go this morning, and with your own hands deliver this letter to Lord Saxon. Do not trust it to any servant or friend; give it direct into his own hands."

"He is coming here this afternoon," I told her, thinking she might then give the letter to him.

"I want him to read it at once. He said he was coming to settle my future to-day; but before he decides upon anything, I wish him to read this. Will you take it to him, Felicia, early this morning? You can drive over to see Lady Saxon, and then place it in his hands."

"Do you wish it very much?" I asked, for I did not care for the commission.

"I do with my whole heart," she said. "Take it, Felicia, and promise me that he shall have it before ten o'clock."

I took the letter from her hands and promised to fulfil her wishes. She kissed me, but her face was deathly cold, and a strange wild gleam was in her eyes. She went to the window and drew aside the lace hangings.

"The sun is rising," she said, "and the river is rushing madly onwards to the sea."

The faint light of the dawn was on her face as she left my room, and those were the last words she ever uttered to me. I heard her close the door, and I hoped fervently that she might rest and sleep.

I did not like the commission; still, as the letter was evidently of great importance, and I had promised, I went. It was just ten o'clock when I reached Dunroon and placed it in Lord Saxon's hands. He was surprised to see me so early, and seemed in no mood to read the letter. He opened it at last. As he read his face grew ghastly white, and he staggered back, with his hand pressed to his brow. He stood for some few minutes stunned and bewildered, then thrust the letter into my hands.

"Read, Felicia," he cried—"read quickly, quickly!"

I hurriedly read the loving, despairing, passionate words that were her death-knell—words all blotted with tears—words written in the early dawn of the day of which she was not to see the end. This was the letter—

"You say, Nello, that you are coming to-day to settle my future. Dear, I shall settle it myself. There is no mercy for me; there is none on earth—there will be none perhaps in heaven; I expect none. And yet my fault was not so great, not so terrible. Such as it was, I will expiate it with my life; and the expiation is a greater sin than that for which you have left me. Now that I have known the warmth and sunshine of your love, I cannot live in the cold and darkness. Better a thousand times to be at rest, with the green grass growing over me, than to live on without happiness, without hope!

"This will be my repentance, Nello. I shall walk out in the early morning to the river when the sun is shining. You know the reach where two days since you stood on the bank and drew the dripping water lilies ashore, and I—the happiest woman in the world—stood by your side. It is there that I shall seek rest. This my repentance, Nello. I shall walk down the path we have so often trodden together, knowing that it is for the last time. As I take my last walk to the river, everything will say good-bye to me. Yet I shall not falter. When the chill water kisses my face, when it seizes me and carries me swiftly along, when it washes my hair and bears me, a deadly burden, on its breast, then my repentance will have been accomplished; and, when this letter reaches your hands, she whom you have loved and spurned will be past reproach, beyond recall. Of all that was but yesterday filled with light and gladness there will remain to-day nothing but a dark memary. Nello my beloved, I write this on my bended knees, and on this sheet have fallen the most bitter tears woman can ever shed. I lay my last kiss on this paper, for I know that you must touch it. I shall die as I have lived, loving you. When I reach the river's brink, I shall love you; when the chill water—kinder than you, beloved—takes me into its embrace, I shall still love you.

"Long as you live, Nello, my spirit will hover near you. During the sweet summer nights, when the wind is sighing in the trees, you will think of me. When you walk by the river and hear the faint sobbing of the water, you will give a thought to her who preferred to die rather than live without you. You will know that my soul was not all false, because it held in it so true a love for you. Through the sigh of the summer wind, through the wash of the waves on the shore, my voice will come to you, and you will remember that, though I sinned greatly, my repentance was terrible. Beloved, farewell!"

I laid down the pitiful letter blotted with tears, and for a minute we looked at each other in silent horror. Then Lord Saxon, rousing himself from the stupor that had come over him, cried out—

"For Heaven's sake come quickly to the river, Felicia!"

But the river was far away, and the hour long past for human power to save her from the doom that she had sought. We drove rapidly from Dunroon to Jesmond Dene, accompanied by Major Esmond, and Lord Saxon led the way to the reach.

It was all too true. There, at the spot indicated in her letter, she lay, her face upraised to the morning sky and a smile on her lips, as though she had found the water kinder than her lover's closed arms and death sweeter than life.

Her body was speedily recovered from its cruel resting-place and conveyed to the Hall.

Lady Saxon and her son, Major Esmond and myself, held a council that same afternoon, and we decided that the last act of kindness we could show to her memory would be to keep her story of duplicity and the cause of her death secret from the world.

There were terrible dismay and consternation throughout the district when it became known that the beautiful Lady Jesmond had been found drowned. Of course it was an accident. Many people thought that she had been trying to reach the water-lilies, and so had fallen in. In the first wild months of her great anguish we were afraid that Mrs. Fairfax would reveal the secret which we all hoped would be buried with the remains of the unfortunate girl. Fortunately she did not disclose the truth. We were compelled to tell Mr. Benson everything; and, to my astonishment, he did not seem greatly surprised. He suggested that Mrs. Fairfax should continue to have charge of the child until he was a few years older, and that afterwards she would be provided for on the estate.

Lady Jesmond's funeral will not soon be forgotten. It was attended by rich and poor, and there was no one who did not regret and grieve over the fair young life so abruptly and, as it seemed, so cruelly cut short.

Lord Saxon was there as chief mourner. The vast assemblege of spectators, beholding his white set face, little dreamed of the tragedy in which he had shared.

"May Heaven pardon me if I was too hard on her!" he said to me, as we stood together after the funeral.

By the end of July a calm that was almost painful had settled over Jesmond Dene. The grass had grown on Alice's newly-made grave, and people wondered why it was always surrounded by beatiful flowers, yet never had a headstone.

There was a calm too at Dunroon; for its master had gone away, and his mother believed that he would never return.

He had suffered terribly during the recent days—so much so that he was a changed man. He regretted having spoken so bitterly to the erring woman, and that he had not been more patient. He felt that he ought to have known what she meant when she said so strangely, "To-morrow!" and he blamed himself for not at the time realising all that her words portended and taking steps to frustrate her design. He did not forget her; and for years his life was embittered and darkened by the tragedy in which he had played so conspicuous a part.

[illegible] while little [illegible] ed [illegible] mained [illegible] Jesmond Hall [illegible] super[illegible] the house and take [illegible] of the child. [illegible] without ever know[illegible] in the whole [illegible] took [illegible] of the unfortunate woman on whose shoulders the responsibility for this sad tragedy rested.

. . . .

Six years afterward, when every one had ceased to expect him, Lord Saxon came home. It was in June, and the nightingales had begun to sing. He asked me to walk with him to hear them; and where we had lingered when he had first kissed me and lovingly whispered my name, we now stood again. He told me how he was learning to love me when that fair but frail woman came between us and snatched his very soul away. He asked me to trust him with my love and to be his wife; while the nightingales sang as though they had always known how my story must end. I did not say "Yes" at once. It was not the passionate love of "long ago," but the more enduring love of maturer years, that I gave him. We were married; and I am now Lady Saxon of Dunroon, and the Dowager Lady Saxon was overjoyed at the realization of her long-deferred hopes. Sooth to say, I worship my husband, and we are very happy; but the words of that terrible letter haunt him. Nello is strong and brave; but there are times when I can see that he is nervous, and those times are when the wind sighs amongst the trees and we can hear the soft low sobbing of the waves on the shore.

But for all thatwe are happy; and I know now what the nightingales sing about in June.

(THE END.)

Building 100 Freight Cars in 9 Hours.

This altogether unparalelled feat was performed in the freight car shops of Pulman's Palace Car Company, at Pullman, Ill., some time ago. The cars were flat, and formed part of an order for the Vicksburg, Shreveport & Pacific Railway Company, which desired to have them delivered as soon as possible. The task was accomplished without any special preparation. The work was "laid out" as usual on Saturday, that is, five sets of wheels and axles were placed on each of the seven tracks used in the work, and the materials for each of the cars were placed along the track in the usual manner. When the whistle sounded at 7 A. M., the men sprang to their work. Of the twenty-nine gangs, twenty-eight consisted of four men each, but the best gang was one hand short, because of sickness. The three men preferred to do the work themselves rather than take on a fourth hand. The first complete car was completed at 9:15 A. M., and the first lot of twelve completed was pulled out of the shop at 10:40 A. M. The hearty interest felt by all the men in this splendid contest was shown by the cheer which ran along the lines when the first finished lot began to move out of the shop. The writer reached the scene at about 4 P. M., and found the floors being laid on the last two or three of the 100 cars. It is within bounds to say that the whole number was finished by 5 P. M., and by 6 P. M. twenty-four of them were lettered and ready to ship. The remaining seventy-six were lettered and shipped during the next day.

Disposing of Chinese Lepers.

Lepers in China are sometimes unceremoniously disposed of. An English writer once saw a leper in a basket by the side of a stream. The basket was filled with stones and moved by a crowd towards the water. The Englishman, who was in a boat, wanted to go on shore and interfere, but was not permitted. He could hear the poor wretch in the basket appeal to his executioners for mercy, but without success, for they proceeded to roll the basket and its occupant to the edge of the river at a point where it was deep and swift, and the miserable victim dropped into a watery grave. The men engaged in the disguustieg work were of a low and pariah class, and were probably engaged by the villagers for the purpose. The indignant witness of this revolting deed stood up in the boat and told the perpetrators that he would report the occurrence to the authorities at Canton, but they only laughed at the threat. What shocked him more than anything in connection with doleful tragedy was the callous demeanor of the adult actors and spectators and the presence of a crowd of children, who appeared to consider the affair very good fun, and to be utterly oblivious to the misery and despair of the doomed wretch.

Death From Lightning.

At a recent congress of German medical men, a paper was read by Herr Heusner on the effect of lightning-stroke on human beings, and the author showed that when the lightning discharge passed through the skin the passage was much easier, that is to say the internal organs are much more conductive than the epidermis. This fact was pretty well-known but it is not so well known that the brain and spinal cord are apparently conductive and hence a lightning stroke on the head does not materially affect the brain beyond shattering the nerves, and causing temporary derangement. Most persons struck by lightning do not remember anything about the stroke, but others describe a sensation such as would be caused by their being struck a heavy blow, and should have likened the shock to what they would be supposed to feel if torn into small pieces. The subject is an obscure one, but happily it is now beginning to engage the attention of Physiologists as well as physicists.

Repose in Conversation.

The quality to be cultivated, if you would have an agreeable manner in conversation, is repose. If you are restless and vehement you will be considered weak. So you must not fidget in your chair, nor run your fingers through your hair, nor crack your finger joints, nor gesticulate like a campaign orator. All of these things are bad form, and make people wish you were absent [illegible] regrets. You must avoid interrupting other talkers, also, and learn to control your temper, and say as little as possible about yourself. No matter how bored you may be, assume the virtue of being interested, and look pleasant at any sacrifice of sincerity and self-respect. Politeness exacts that you do unto others at such times as you expect them to do unto you when your turn comes. Your language should be simple and terse, but clear and comprehensive, and free from slang. Do not seek to shine as a humorist unless you are very confident that the company is an easy one to amuse; but if another person makes such a venture it is your duty to laugh, even if his jokes are so [illegible] and flat that you long to strangle him. The amenities of social conversation do not permit the introduction of political or religious topics, for the reason that they can rarely be discussed in a calm and kind spirit.—[The Mentor.

"No Physic, Sir, in Mine!"

A good story comes from a boys' boarding-school in "Jersey." The diet was monotonous and constipating, and the learned Principal decided to introduce some old-style physic in the apple-sauce, and await the happy results. One bright lad, the smartest in the school, discovered the secret mine in his sauce, and pushing back his plate, shouted to the pedagogue, "No physic, sir, in mine. My dad told me to use nuthin' but Dr. Pierce's 'Pleasant Purgative Pellets,' and they are a doing their duty like a charm!" They are anti-bilious, and purely vegetable.

"Do you understand how to fix up my hair?" asked a lady of her newly hired colored servant. "Yes, ma'am; I kin fix it up in ten minutes." "You will never do for me. What would I do with myself all the rest of the day?"

"Hello!" we heard one man say to another the other day. "I didn't know you at first, why! you look ten years younger than you did when I saw you last." "I feel ten years younger," was the reply. "You know I used to be under the weather all the time and gave up expecting to be any better. The doctor said I had consumption. I was terribly weak, had night-sweats, cough, no appetite, and lost flesh. I saw Dr. Pierce's 'Golden Medical Discovery' advertised, and thought it would do no harm if it did no good. It has cured me. I am a new man because I am a well one."

PERSONALITIES.

Among the World of Gossip and Society.

Mr. Matthew Arnold will soon resign his position as Inspector of Schools in order to make an extended tour of this country.

Although the newspapers have announced that Madame Patti has bought a handsome billiard table and sent it to her castle in Wales, it is not she who plays the game: but Nicolini.

Fifty years ago Meissonier's pictures fetched from five to eight dollars apiece, and while making them he was so poor that his luncheon consisted of a raw apple, and his dinner of soup, bread and fried potatoes, his total living expences for six months being ten dollars.

One of the ornaments of Prince Bismarck's audience chamber is a marble bust of Count Von Moltke, the base of which is encircled by a wreath of laurel and oak leaves bound with a broad ribbon of black, red and yellow. Portraits of Beaconsfield and Thiers face each other.

Some men have greatness thrust upon them. Dr. Schweninger, of Munich, having cured Arince Bismarck of obesity, has been make "extraordinary professor" at Berlin. But his new colleagues at the institution do not take kindly to him, and Dr. Schweninger challenged the rector to fight a duel, which he declined to do.

"George Elliot's Life as Related in Her Letters and Journals" is the title of the forth-coming work by her husband, Mr. J. W. Cross, who has arranged her letters and journals so as to make practically an autobiography. The famous novelist was wont to lay bare her mind with great frankness before her various correspondents.

Mr. W. T. Dannat's large picture of four life sized strolling Spanish musicians, which was perhaps the best executed and most important American contribution to the last Paris Salon, is now at Mr. Shaus's gallery. It is a wonderful piece of realism, flavered to a highly suggestive degree with the personality of the author.

Captain Ericsson, though more than eighty years old, has few of the physical traits of an octogenarian. Neither his hair nor his beard is grey. Twehty-three years ago his little Monitor saved the day in Hampton Roads by putting the Merrimac to flight. He lives in a modest way in New York City, and still applies his mind to inventions of various kinds.

Some time ago General Di Cesnola presented a cast of an original Babylonian cylinder to Mr. J. F. X. O'Conor, an American pupil of Professor Haupt. The cylinder contained an inscription in Assyrian cuneiform letters, which Mr. O'Conor has translated, and which refers to Nebuchadnezzar and the magnificent building of Babylon.

Sir William Thomson, of the University of Edinburgh, is one of the directors of the railroad at the Giant's Causeway, where electricity is successfully used as a motive power. At Mr. Cyrus W. Field's request, he recently made a examination of the New York elevated roads, and reported that the same motive power could be applied to them with a great saving in the cost of running. The experiment will soon be tried.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley, the eminent African explorer, is one of the most important of the technical advisers before the Congo Conference at Berlin. Probably no man possesses so thorough a knowledge of the Congo and of the vast territory through which it flows as the author of Through the Dark Continent, published by Harper & Brothers, in which Mr. Stanley narrates the adventures that attended his exploration of that mighty river.

Mr. Andrew Lang writes that when a boy somebody gave him a copy of Edgar Poe's lurid tales, which greatly frightened him. "Every night I expected to wake up in my coffin, having been prematurely buried; or to hear sighs in the area, followed by light, unsteady footsteps on the stairs, and then to see a lady all in a white shroud, stained with blood and clay, stagger into my room. I had as bad a time of it in the night watches as any happy British child has survived."

Professor Tyndall claims to be a descendant of Tyndale the translator of the Bible, and to have a yearly income of only $6,000. Six years after he left school he was a civil engineer's assistant at a salary of five dollars a week. "I have often wondered since," he says, "at the amount of genuine happiness which a young fellow of regular habits, not caring for pipe or mug, may extract from pay like that." Subsequently when studying at Marburg, Germany, he "worked without weariness sixteen hours a day."

Edmund Yates en Charles Dickens: "In regard to the friendship which Dickens vouchsafed me, I have been frequantly asked, 'Did he come up to the expectations you had formed of him? was Dickens, the man, as lovable as Dickens, the author?' and I have always replied, 'Yes, wholly.' All the kindness of heart, generosity, generosity, appreciation of what was could be appreciated in others, manly independence, hatred of humbug, all the leading qualities of his books, were component parts of his nature."

The late Earl of Malmesbury saw the Emperor Napoleon the Third at Wilhelmshone, who, during half an hour, conversed with me calmly as in the best days of his life, with a dignity and distinguation which might be that of a father, but could hardly be obtained from any other creed. When I saw him again I found him much more depressed at the destruction of Paris and at the anarchy prevailing over France than he was at his own misfortunes; and that the Communists should have committed such horrors in the presence of their remedies, the German armies, appeared to him the very acme of humiliation and of national infamy."

The Paris press have been attacking Mlle. Van Zandt, the American singer, with suspicious unanimity. A cable this, patch gives the following explanation: "She would not purchase the favor of the Boulevard critics by money or otherwise. She poses a little as a hoyden, but is thoroughly well-behaved, and is admitted into the best French society. Her cheekbones are high, her forehead, brows, and eyes show intensity of character and intellect, and her mouth is simply perfect. The hair auburn, and has narrowly escaped being sandy. She abhors the stage, and only sings because she wants money. She is not luxurious in taste or habits, and her dream of happiness is the tranquil life of an English or an American home."

A HUSBAND'S DUAL CRIME.

He fatally wounds His Wife and then kills Himself.

The little market town of Edenboro, in Erie county, Pa., has been the scene of a terrible tragedy, a jealous husband having shot his young wife and blown out his own brains, after a futile attempt to murder his step father. The tragedy occurred at an early hour in the Exchange Hotel, where the husband had found his wife after looking for her nearly a week.

The murderer and his victim are Mr and Mrs. Charles Williams, of Cambridge, They were married about a year ago, but have lived unhappy owing to the morbid and unwarranted jealousy of Williams. His wife was Miss Maggie Parshal, daughter of William Parshal, a farmer of Edenboro. She was a girl of considerable personal attractions, of which she was quite conscious. She had many admirers, one of them being a clergyman. She preferred Charles Williams, who was an idle and dissolute fellow, with no visible means of support, who, during his courtship, frequently showed his insane jealousy. Her friends, foreseeing a miserable life if she married him, earnestly desired her to break off the connection and accept another lover. The love sick girl turned a deaf ear to all entreaties however, but in less than a month after marrying him, she became entirely disenchanted and realized the full force of the warnings which she had disregarded.

The slightest attentions of ordinary politeness shown her by her gentleman friends were regarded as fraught with concealed meaning by her husband, and the life led by her at last became so unbearable that last week she packed her valise and left his home, going to Edenboro. There her husband tracked her, and he and his stepfather, Mr. George Redmond, visited her, the latter acting in the capacity of a mediator. An affecting interview took place, resulting in the wife consenting to try her husband once more, he promising to trust her implicitly.

With a kiss and a fond embrace the reconciliation was sealed and the husband and wife passed out into the street arm in arm. They entered the store of F. I. Proudfit and Williams purchased for his wife a pair of kid shoes. To the storekeeper they appeared to be most affectionate, the man lavishing upon her a whole vocabulary of endearing terms. Williams announced his intention of occupying the room in the hotel which his wife occupied, and the pair retired to rest about midnight.

An hour later, Redmond, the successful peacemaker, was aroused by hearing Mrs. Williams exclaim:

"My God, Charlie, I am innocent!"

"False devil, you lie!" he heard Williams reply.

Then a shot was heard, followed by a terrible shriek and a heavy fall. Redmond rushed up the stairs and was met on the landing by Williams, who stood with a revolver in his hand. He fired twice at Redmond, but missed him. Then putting the muzzle to his own head he fired and put a bullet through his brains falling dead on the landing. The wife is still alive, but she cannot live. At present she is unable to talk.

Mrs. Williams the victim of Charles Williams her husband, who blew his brains out Saturday night after attempting to murder his step father and shooting his wife, still lives but the end is expected every hour. Redmond the stepfather who acted as a mediator between the jealous husband and his wife, maintains a dogged silence concerning the cause, if any, existed for William's last exhibition of jealousy. When questioned concerning the unhappy life led by Mrs. Williams, Redmond positively refused to speak. A new and peculiar feature of the affair was developed to-day which may account for Redmond's reticence.

It appears that Redmond was the husband of Mrs. Williams for a brief period before Williams met her, although the marriage was not known at the time. It now transpires that after a few weeks Redmond and his youthful bride parted, and Redmond married her mother, who is nearer his age. Thus Mrs. Redmond's husband became her stepfather, and therefore she called him pa. Her last words were to Redmond, saying: "Pa, he has killed me." When Mrs. Williams almost crazed with terror at the actions of her jealous husband, quitted his home a year ago, she went to live with her mother, and was thus brought beneath the same roof with Redmond, once her husband, but now her mother's. This circumstance it is believed, served to intensify William's jealousy, and was probably the cause of the attack upon Redmond's life. An additional complication is telephoned from Edenboro to-night to the effect that Williams had also met and married the mother, before he met and married the daughter, so that each man has been married in turn to both mother and daughter.

THE DETENANTED ROOM.

A Mystery which has Never Been Solved.

In June, 1872, Kenneth Franklin, a son of one of the old Maryland families, was graduated from an institution of learning in that State. Three months later Franklin arrived in New York, intending to read medicine with a distinguished surgeon living not far from Union square. At that time Franklin was 21 years old, 5 feet 10 inches high, and weighed 170 pounds. He was a good specimen of manhood, well educated, clear-headed, and not given to excesses.

Mr. Franklin, reached New York by way of the Pennsylvania Railroad at 9:15 o'clock Sunday evening. He went directly to the Astor House, and after dining ordered copies of the daily papers. Then he sat down in his room and carefully read the advertisements of lodging to let. Finally he cut from a paper two advertisements. One of these announced that a second-floor front room, well-furnished, could be found on East Fifteenth street. The number given was four doors west from Union square on the south side of the street. The other advertisement described a room in the same street, on the east side of the square, but, curiously enough, in a corresponding situation in the street. The next morning Franklin arose late, breakfasted, and walked up Broadway to Union-square. The day was mild and pleasant and not too warm. Franklin was deeply interested in all he saw around him, and enjoyed the quick, active life of the great thoroughfare with all the zest which belongs to a man fresh from school. His previous visits to New York had been few and of short duration, and, while he did not feel entirely a stranger, he looked at all he saw with keen pleasure.

It was 10:40 when Franklin reached Union-square, and he stopped and debated whether he should turn to the left and go first to the house west of the square, or to the right and go to the house east of the square. He decided upon the former, chiefly because he had walked up on the west side of Broadway. The house mentioned in the advertisement was one of those ordinary three story, brown-stone structures which are to be found in most of the lateral up-town streets of New York. There was a flight of stone steps leading up to a double-door, and there were blinds carefully closed upon all the windows in the front of the house. The neighborhood had an air of agreeable quiet, and as Franklin surveyed the house he was exceedingly pleased with his prospective residence. When he rang the bell there was a proper amount of delay in opening the door, and so sensitive was the young man to the minor evidences of good breeding that he was much pleased with this. But as the door swung back he was very much startled. There stood upon the threshold a singular-looking man of most unprepossessing appearance. He was of stunted statue and evidently about 40 years old. His hands and feet were large, as was his head, which, because of his short neck, seemed to rest upon his broad shoulders. His hair, which was black, grew down to within a finger's width of his eyebrows, which met in a straight, black line. The skin between the hair and eyebrows was unusually white, and his face, upon which no beard had ever grown, was equally white. His eyes were dark and cold, his nose thin and clear cut, and his mouth small, with thin lips closing over large, white teeth.

Franklin experienced one of those curious changes of feeling which we are wont to call revulsions when he saw the man before him. Instantly he determined that he would not make known his real errand. "I don't like that face," he he thought, "and I don't care to live in a house which a man with such a face makes his home." Accordingly the young man said with a little hesitation that he was looking for a friend who lived in the neighborhood and thought the inmates of that house might give him some information. The man in the doorway answered the caller's questions pleasantly, and Franklin thanked him and walked down the steps. Turning as he reached the sidewalk Franklin saw the singular-looking man still standing on the threshold, and noted with chagrin and embarassment a smile of mingled scorn and amusement on his features. No man likes to feel that he has not been equal to an emergency, especially when the emergency calls for a keen wit. As Franklin walked away, flushed and angry, he knew his explanation had not been believed. But the morning was too beautiful for ill-humour to remain long with any man, especially a young one, and five minutes walk around the square restored Franklin to his usual good temper. Then he walked to the east side of the square, determined to try the house mentioned in the second advertisement. A hasty survey of the house showed that it was exactly like the one he had already visited, except that instead of blinds there were inside shutters. The neighborhood was equally attractive. Franklin rang the bell with confidence, feeling that while he had, perhaps, been hasty in deciding against the other house, he had had the good fortune to find one equally desirable. To his surprise and consternation, when the door opened there stood before him a man corresponding in every detail to the ill-favored person in the other house. But there was apparently no recognition of Franklin on his part. Franklin was puzzled. He was sure that the man before him was the same he had left laughing at him little more than five minutes before, and could not understand his presence here. But the young man was quick to act, and instantly decided to enter the house and, if possible, to solve apparent mystery.

"I have called to look at lodgings which are advertised as being to let here," said he.

"Will you step in?" said the man. The voice was certainly the same, Franklin thought.

The interior of the house was in no way [illegible] quiet. This the landlord, for such the mysterious man was, explained by saying that all the other lodgers were out, and that he and and the single servant who assisted him in the care of the room, were alone in the house. None of the rooms were open, but the hall in which the two men stood Franklin could see was well-furnished. The landlord led the way up a flight of stairs, carpeted so thickly that the footfall was smothered in its birth, and Franklin followed. The stairs terminated in a broad landing, from which a corridor was pierced with three doors, evidently opening into as many rooms, the other side was perfectly blank. As the corridor ran through the centre of the house this blank wall struck him as being rather strange. Although the left wall looking down the corridor was blank, Franklin saw that directly opposite the head of the stairs there was a door in this wall. This the landlord opened, and walking to the window drew back the curtains and let a flood of light into the room. When Franklin's eyes became accustomed to the light he found himself standing in a large, richly furnished room, with easy chairs, a few good pictures, bits of bric-a-brac and a white marble mantle carved with grapes and other fruits.

"I like this," he said mentally, and then repeated it aloud. "What is the price?"

The landlord named terms which were satisfactory, and in a few minutes Franklin had paid an instalment and taken possesion of the room. "I will send my baggage up from the hotel," he said to the landlord. "By the way, may I ask your name?"

"Jaster—Melchisedek Jaster," said the landlord. "Odd name, isn't it?" he added, as he saw a smile on Franklin's face. "My people were pious, read the Bible you know; found the name somewhere there, I believe."

"It doesn't matter," said Franklin, with an indifferent laugh. "There isn't much in a name. Mine is Kenneth Franklin."

"Very well, Mr. Franklin," said Jaster; "I hope you'll be comfortable here."

"I dare say I shall," replied Franklin. "Who are your other lodgers?"

"Only the two rooms farthest down the hall are occupied. An agent has one of them and a law clerk the other. The lower part of the house I use myself. I live alone, except for my lodgers and my own servant. If you need anything you will find a bell there by the mantel, which she will answer. Good-day, sir."

Franklin remained in the room only a few minutes after Jaster left it and then went out. After luncheon he called upon the surgeon with whom he was to study, and then wandered around the city. Dining early, he went to the theatre and returned to his room about midnight. The house was quiet when he entered, but as he reached the head of the stairs he thought he heard a low murmur of voices in the room nearest to his door. As this was the one Jaster said was not tenanted, he concluded he must have been mistaken, and that the voices came from one of the other rooms.

Franklin fell into a light slumber almost as soon as his head touched the pillow, but was awakened presently by a loud knock at his door. He waited a minute and the knock was repeated.

"Who's there?" he called.

There was no answer. Rising from his bed he walked over to the door and opened it. There was no one in sight. The moonlight streaming into the corridor from the window at the lower end made every object discernable. Franklin went back to bed, somewhat puzzled. He was again almost asleep when another knock sounded upon his door. This time he noiselessly left the bed and walked over to the door. He listened intently, but heard nothing. Then, while he stood with his ear so close to the door that he could feel the vibrations, the knock was repeated, this time with great energy. Franklin flung the door open and dashed into the hall. There was nothing in sight except the moonlight streaming into the window. Peering over the edge of the railing he could hear or see nothing down the flight of stairs, though sufficient light entered the lower hall from a street lamp shining through the narrow windows on either side of the door to have disclosed a person had one been present.

The young man returned to his room slowly and again sought his bed. He was anything but superstitious, and the mysterious knocks greatly perplexed him. But by and by he again went to sleep. This time he was aroused by voices evidently in fierce altercation in one of the rooms across the hall. Franklin lay for a few moments listening to the sounds, which were gradually increasing in volume. Then he arose and for the third time opened the door. As he did so he heard the voices more distinctly, and he was startled to note that they came from the room nearest his door. He heard a man's voice say in expostulatory tones: "Don't. What's the use. I tell you—"

"But I will," interrupted a woman's voice.

"Then I'll kill you," said the man, as if seized with a sudden fury. There was choking, gurgling sound as if some one was being strangled.

"I can't stand this," said Franklin, aloud, and he ran across the short space between his door and that of the room which Jaster had said was unoccupied. Seizing the knob he turned it without any ceremony and opened the door, following it as it swung back.

Suddenly he felt something wet dashed in his face and then a blinding blow fell crashing upon his head.

When Franklin recovered consciousness he found himself on his own bed, with the gas lighted and Jaster standing [illegible]

"I found you in the hall senseless," said Jaster. "You have fallen and struck your forehead. There is a lump there."

Franklin did not speak for a minute. Then he said slowly: "Who is in that first room over there?"

"That is the one I told you was vacant," said Jaster. "It has been vacant for a long time."

"Vacant!" said Franklin. "Why there was a man in there choking a woman to death, and when I went in he struck me over the head with something. It must have been a washbowl, for this feels like soapy water," said the young man, as he felt of his night dress, the shoulders of which were saturated.

"I think you were dreaming," said Jaster quietly. "There's nobody in the room. Can I do anything more for you?"

Franklin answered in the negative and Jaster left the room. The young man felt dizzy and confused and soon fell into a troubled sleep. When he opened his eyes again it was broad daylight. As he dressed before the mirror he saw that there was a swelling of considerable size upon his left temple, and he gradually thought over the events of the night and Jaster's assertion that he had been dreaming. "I know I was not dreaming, he said, "and I mean to know what is in that room." Accordingly when he had finished dressing he opened his door and walked directly across to the door of the mysterious room. Bending down, he put his hand upon the carpet at the threshold where he had stood the night before, and felt that it was still damp. He knocked at the door and the blow seemed to awaken only hollow echos. He knocked again with no better result. Then he turned the knob and stepped into the room. By the light that came through a dusty window and from the open door behind him Franklin saw that the room was absolutely bare. There was not in it a single piece of furniture of any description. The dust lay thick upon the uncarpeted floor undisturbed except by the tracks which his own feet had made. It was evident the room had not been entered before in months.

Franklin left the house determined to put the case into the hands of a detective. Within an hour he received a dispatch from his father summoning him home without a moment's delay. He had not even time to return to his room, but sent a message to Jaster asking that his effects be forwarded. Then he started South.

All this was in September, 1872. Last week Franklin came to New York for the first time since he left it so hastily. The house where he spent one night was torn down years ago. Nobody could be found who remembered Melchisedek Jasper.

A Strange Fish.

A correspondent in the island of Papa Westray, Orkney, Scotland, writes:—While passing along an outlying point on the east side of the island recently, I came across a rather strange-looking fish which had been driven ashore during the late stormy weather. No one here seems to have seen or heard of anything like it. At first sight it appeared to belong to the porpoise or dolphin class, its body being speckled in a similar manner and also of the same color. On removing the seaweed in which it was partly embedded, it was found that the length of the body was five feet seven inches, and the tail, which is longer than the body, measures six feet. Its girth round the thickest part is over four feet, and at the commencement of the tail one foot six inches. Its mouth is very small compared to the rest of the fish, being only five inches across, and is armed with three rows of short sharp teeth, with the points turned inwards. In some particulars it resembles the common dogfish, the openings of the gills being the same. The two side fins, both in position and shape, also resemble those of the dogfish. They seem to be very powerful and strong. When spread out they measure between four and five feet across. The most peculiar part of it is its tail, which, as I have stated, is six feet long. Where it joins the body it resembles very closely that of the dogfish; measured across its broadest part it is one foot four inches, and where the upper part branches off it is ten inches broad and two inches thick, resembling the blade of a knife with the edge on the under side. From this it runs off and terminates in a point about one inch broad and half an inch thick. When floating on the water the tail was fully half out, and forming an angle of about 45 degrees with the surface. The eyes are very close to the nose and only three inches apart.

What's in a Name?

One of the upper ten thousand, who was visiting America, accepted the hospitality of a gentleman in New York. When taking farewell of his host, the latter asked him what he thought of the American people. "Well," answered the nobleman, "I like them immensely, but I miss something." "What is that?" asked the Yankee. "I miss the aristocracy!" replied the Englishman. "What are they?" naively asked his host. "The aristocracy!" said the nobleman, in a somewhat surprised tone of voice, "why, they are people who do nothing, you know; whose fathers did nothing, you know; whose grandfatherr did nothing, you know—in fact, the aristocracy." Here he was interrupted by the American, who chimed in with, "Oh, we've plenty of them over here; but we don't call them aristocracy we call them tramps."

President Grevy has published a decree stating that a universal exhibition in Paris will open May 5th, 1889. Now is the time for our boys and girls to commence depositing in the savings bank.

MARKDALE DEC. 11, 1884.

OBITUARY.

Mr. Thos. Lowe, one of the first settlers in this district, passed away on Sunday last, 7th inst., at the ripe age of 83 years. He enjoyed good health up to the time of his demise; was a cheerful and exceedingly kind dispositioned man and highly respected by all who knew him.

SUDDEN DEATH.

Our respected townsman, Mr John Montgomery, baker, died suddenly early Tuesday morning. He was about his customery duties the day previous, delivering bread around town, when nothing special appeared wrong with the old gentleman. We learned since, however, that he was suffering from a severe cold, and was taken with weak spells occasionally; nothing was thought of it as he has not been rugged for some time. He retired to rest Monday night as usual, coughed considerably during the night. Mrs. Montgomery (who is also in a weak state of health) was shocked to find, in the morning, her partner a corpse. The old lady has the sympathy of the community in her sorrow and affliction which it is feared she may not survive.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR.—Notwithstanding the very bad state of the roads, the Orange Soiree held at Kells' corners on the fourth inst., was a grand success. Tea was served at the house of Mr. Kells, the parties retired from thence to the hall which was well filled. In commencing the intellectual part of the proceedings, the committee with exceeding regret, had to make some changes in the programme as some of the gentlemen who had promised to aid in the entertainment were unavoidable prevented from coming, however other parties present, kindly, and ably, aided towards the enjoyment of the evening, especially the Rev. A. Wilson who delivered a very eloquent and pleasing address, highly appreciated by all present. Miss Wilson also acted well her part by rendering music vocal and instrumental as did Miss Ford and others. There was also recitations and readings by the following ladies and gentlemen namely:—

Misses McDuffie, Gimby, Messrs. I. Stinson, W. J. Benson, Geo. Marshall, Fred Boland, Thos. Boland.

Special interest was taken in the pieces so ably rendered by Miss McDuffie Messrs I. Stinson and W. J. Benson which brought down the house every time. The best of order prevailed all agreeing that a very pleasant evening was spent. The usual vote of thanks being put to the meeting and tendered to the parties entitled thereto. It being about 10:30 o'clock p. m. the National antham was sung and the Rev. A. Wilson brought the meeting to a close by pronouncing the benediction.

Proceeds of the evening amounted to $81.40.

THE MURDERER'S DOOM.

Execution of Cook Teets at Owen Sound.

He Protests His Innocence of the Crime to the End.

HOW HE PASSED HIS LAST HOURS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

OWEN SOUND, Dec. 5.—The first time the extreme penalty of the law has ever been inflicted in the county of Grey was in the case of Cook Teets, who was hanged this morning, for the poisoning of his wife. The crime, the trial, and now the carrying into effect of the sentence have made a profound sensation here—a sensation heightened by the fact that the prisoner was totally blind—the condemned man himself being apparently less concerned than any others who have had connection with the case. His council, Jas. Mason, Esq., made endeavours to have the sentence commuted, and while the matter was still in doubt the prisoner said if he was not to get out, he would just as soon be hanged as kept in confinement, and he was quite prepared for it. When he was informed yesterday afternoon that the Exctive would not interfere, he did not seem much concerned, and in the evening, in the presence of Rve. J. E. Howell, who has been constant in his ministrations, requested his counsel to take down the following statement:—

LAST STATEMENT OF COOK TEETS.

My council has informed me that there is no hope of my sentence being commuted, and that I must to morrow suffer the extreme penalty of the law. I think it my duty to make this statement:—With the advice and consent of her father and mother I married Rosannah Leppard, intending to live the remainder of my days with her as my wife. Shortly before our marriage, with the advice and consent of her father, I let her have money to insure her life. Her father and one Wilson had spoken about getting insurance. It was at her own request that her life was insured. She wanted it in case anything happened to her that there would be something to support her children. We spoke about having the policy payable to herself, or payable to her father. Mr. Purdy wrote to the company explaining that we were going to get married, and the policy was made to me as her promised husband. She trusted to me giving it to her children, or spending it for their benefit. Her mother consented to our marriage, and was anxious for me to marry her, and went with Rosannah and me to Robert Trimble's store to purchase things for the marriage. I payed part then, and gave Rosannah $6 a few days afterwards to buy some other things.

HER MOTHER PRESSED ME HARD to get married at once. She said it would cost no more now than afterwards. Her mother wanted us to be married by a priest. I did not want to be married by a priest, and Rosannah did not want to either, only her mother. I took her and went to Toronto, and was married by a Presbyterian minister. When we came back I did not go to her mother's with her, but she told me afterwards that her mother said to her when she came in. "Are you married now, Rosie?" That she said, "Yes." Her mother said, "Have you a certificate?" and she said, "Yes." Her mother said, "Who were you married by—a priest?" She said, "No, by a Presbyterian minister." Her mother then said, "Take him and go to hell with him, for that is where you will go anyway." On the 7th October I started for Michigan, and we were gone just two weeks. When we came back she went to her mother's and I went home to my mother's; that was on Tuesday. On the Sunday I met her on the road near my mother's, and went back with her as far as my sister's. She then told me and wanted me to take her out of the house, I told her I would go down on the Monday, I did so, and we spoke of getting a house from Pedlar. She was to see Pedlar the next day. I left Leppard's about 4 o'clock or a little before that, I stopped in at Middleton's and he told me it was then 15 or 20 minutes to 5 o'clock, I then went to my sister's and rested a little then went home. On leaving Leppard's Rosannah went part of the way with me. We stopped to light our pipes, while we were lighting our pipes Sherwood passed. She stopped lighting her pipe, she said, "There is Sherwood, I don't want to let him see me smoking." I said "You are my wife, not his servant." She got up and we went a little further on towards my place and had our smoke. I do not know that she had a paper. She may have had matches in paper, or may have had tobacco in paper, or may have used paper to light the pipes. I gave her no paper or anything else. Sherwood stated that when we got up that we went back towards her father's place, such is not the case. We then parted, she went back to her mother's and I went home.

HER MOTHER WAS ILLUSING HER,

I NEVER SAW HER AGAIN ALIVE.

I never knew anything until Bridget came and told me she was dead. I don't know what I said, I was so full of grief. I went to my sister's. My sister asked me to wait; that she would drive me over. I went to her bedside and asked her to speak. I said I knew she was not dead, to speak and tell me what is the matter. My sister was beside me and said "Rosie will never speak again." I asked Bridget what was the matter, and she said she did not know. I asked her if Rosie said what was the matter, or what she complained of, or something like that, I never said at her bedside or in Leppard's that I "was the cause of it," or that I "came down on her sudden," or that I knew anything about it. I did not know anything about it. I do not know where the poison was got, or who got it, wherever it came from it never came out of my bottle. I had the poison for not quite two years. I got it in Lexington, Michigan, for to get furs. I used some of it, and got a few furs for a cap for my mother, which I tanned myself. I made no secret about having the poison. Mrs. Leppard asked me for some to poison dogs. She said that there were dogs that bothered her cattle in the bush. I never gave her any. I never suggested to her to put it in onions to poison people who were stealing her onions. Such a thing was never mentioned. That whole story is a fabrication.

As far as the death of Rosannah is concerned, I know nothing about it.

I go to my death an innocent man. Thank God I do not die with a load of guilt on my shoulders. I am ready to die. I feel my Savour say, it is all right, Cook.

I bid all my friends good-by, and die an innocent man.

Taken before me this 4th Dec., 1884.

THE DOOMED MAN'S UNCONCERN.

The prisoner was one of the early settlers of the township of Artemesia, and became partily blind about thirty years ago, having lost the sight of one eye by a snowball, and of the other by inflammation. As an evidence of how unconcerned he was at his approaching doom, it may be mentioned that he sat up till three o'clock this morning, telling stories and relating his exploits to his guards. The sentence was carried into effect at eight o'clock this morning, in the gaol yard, in presence of the sheriff and other officials and reporters, the condemned man firmly maintaining his innocence to the end.

By Associated Press.

OWEN SOUND, Ont., Dec. 5.—This morning at eight o'clock Cook Teets, convicted of murdering his wife by administering poison to her a year ago last October, in the township of Artemesia, paid the penalty of his crime on the gallows. His solicitor, during the trial at the assize court, made every effort to have the death sentence commuted, but without avail. Last night he received a telegram from Ottawa stating there would be no executive interference. The doomed man received the news with great calmness, in fact, ever since his imprisonment in October, 1883, and since the sentence of the court, a month ago, he has conducted himself with great composure, and manifested the greatest indifference as to his horrible crime and the terrible end that awaits him. Last night, as the hours were fast fleeting away and the dreaded moment approached, he occupied the time leisurely talking with those who happened to visit him. Whenever the subject of the murder was reverted to he protested his innocence, and declared in the most emphatic manner that he was innocent of the charge.

Yesterday, in the presence of the clergy and others, he made a long statement in writing, reviewing the whole case and denying the evidence given at the trial by the Leppard family. The statement will be published. This morning the prisoner was attended by the Rev. J. Howell, Methodist minister, and the Rev. A. H. Scott, pastor of Knox church. They visited the cell early, and held conversation and prayer with the doomed man, who appeared quite penitent and prepared for the end, but still declared his innocence. He had no desire to make any statment on the scaffold, and requested the jail officials to have the ceremony as short as possible. At just three minutes to eight o'clock the cell door was opened and the sad procession started, consisting of the prisoner, supported on the right and left by Rev. Messrs. Howell and Scott, and followed by the sheriff, jailor and other officials. The prisoner walked to the scaffold and ascended the steps with all the fortitude and firmness describable and took his stand on the trap door of the scaffold. While the hangman was adjusting the noose the prisoner shuddered and gave himself a slight turn to the left, which was followed by a nervous trembling for a few moments during the delivery of the Lord's prayer by Rev. Mr. Howell. The hangman then drew the bolt, and Cook Teets was almost instantaneously ushered into eternity. After the body had been hanging for about fifteen minutes it was cut down and an inquest held by Coroner Cameron. The jury returned a verdict of death by hanging in compliance with the sentence of the court.—Mail.

A wealthy farmer in Brantford township, 2 miles from Paris, named James Crawford, aged 38 years, hanged himself in his stable last Tuesday Morning.

A Good Record.—The Canadian Pacific steamers Algoma and Athabasca, which are now both in winter quarters here, have each made 28 round trips between here and Port Arthur during the past season. Admission 25 cents. See large posters for full particulars.

New Church.—A meeting of the Methodist congregation was held last Monday evening to consider the propriety of building a new church the coming year. The village having been partially canvassed for subscriptions, a list was produced with over $1,800 already subscribed, which amount will be swelled to at least $2,000 in the village alone, and it is expected there will be no difficulty adding another $1,000 from the country, which will be sufficient to warrant the trustees in commencing operations. The meeting was, however, adjourned until Friday evening, 12th inst., in order to have a better representation, and to more fully consider the important undertaking.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

Considering the world-wide reputation of the Bank of England, it is remarkable how little is generally known as to its internal working. Standing in the very heart of the largest city in the world—a central landmark of the great metropolis, even the busy Londoners around it, have, as a rule, only the vaguest possible knowledge of what goes on within its walls. In truth, its functions are so many, its staff so enormous, and their duties so varied, that many even of those who have spent their lives in its service will tell you that, beyond their own immediate departments, they know but little of its inner life. Its mere history, as recorded by Mr. Francis, fills two octavo volumes. It will be readily understood, therefore, that it would beidle to attempt anything like a complete description of it within the compass of a magazine article. There are, however, many points about the Bank and its working which are extremely curious and interesting, andsome of which we propose briefly to deseribe.

The Bank of England originated in the brain of William Patterson, a Scotchman—better known, perhaps, as the organizer and leader of the ill-fated Darien expedition. It commenced business in 1694, its charter—which was in the first instance granted for eleven years only—bearing date the 27th July of that year. This charter has been from time to time renewed, the last renewal having taken place in 1844. The original capital of the Bank was but one million two hundred thousand pounds, and it carried on its business in a single room in Mercer's Hall, with a staff of fifty-four clerks. From so small a beginning has grown the present gigantic establishment, which covers nearly three acres, and employs in town and country nearly nine hundred officials. Upon the latest renewal of i's charter, the Bank was divided into two distinct departments, the Issue and the Banking. In addition to these, the Bank has the management of the national debt. The books of the various government funds are here kept; here all transfers are made,and here all dividends are paid.

IN THE BANKING DEPARTMENT

is transacted the ordinary business of bankers. Here other banks keep their "reserve," and hence draw their supplies as they require them. The Issue department is intrusted with the circulation of the notes of the bank, which is regulated as follows. The Bank in 1844 was a creditor of the government to the extent of rather over eleven million pounds and to this amount and four million pounds beyond, for which there is in other ways sufficient security, the Bank is allowed to issue notes without having gold in reserve to meet them. Beyond these fifteen million pounds, every note issued represents gold actually in the coffers of the Bank. The totai value of the notes in the hands of the public at one time averages about twenty-five million pounds. To these must be added other notes to a very large amount in the hands of the Banking department, which deposits the bulk of its reserve of gold in the Issue department; accepting notes in exchange.

All Bank of England notes are printed in the Bank itself. Six printing-presses are in constant operation, the same machine printing first the particulars of value, signature, &c., and then the number of the note in consecutive order. The paper used is of very peculiar texture, being at once thin, tough and crisp; and the combination of these qualities, together with the peculiarities of the watermark, which is distributed over the whole surface of the paper, forms one of the principal guarantees against imitation. The paper which is manufactured exclusively at one particular mill, is made in oblong slips, allowing just enough space for the printing of two notes side by side. The edges of thepaper are left untrimmed, but, after printing, the two notes are divided by a straight cut between them. This accounts for the fact, which many of our readers will doubtless have noticed, that only one edge of a Bank-note is smooth, the other three being comparatively ragged. The printing-presses are so constructed as to register each note printed, so that the machine itself indicates automatically how many notes have passed through it. The average production of notes is fifty thousand a day, and about the same number are presented in the same time for payment.

No note is ever issued a second time. When once it finds its way back to the Bank to be exchanged for coin, it is immediately cancelled; and the reader will probably be surprised to hear that the average life of a Bank-note, or the time during which it is in actual circulation, is not more than five or six days. The returned notes, averaging, as we have stated, about fifty thousand a day, and representing one day with another, about one million pounds in value, are brought into what is known as the ACCOUNTANT'S SORTING OFFICE.

Here they are examined by inspectors, who reject any which may be found to be counterfeit. In such a case the paying-in bank is debited with the amount. The notes come in from various banks in parcels, each parcel accompanied by a memorandum stating the number and amount of the notes contained. This memorandum is marked with a certain number, and then each note in the parcel is stamped to correspond, the stamping-machine automatically registering how many are stamped, and consequently drawing immediate attention to any deficiency in the number of notes as compared with that stated in the memorandum. This done, the notes are sorted according to number and date, and after being defaced by punching out the letters indicating value, and tearing off the corner bearing the signature, are passed on to the "Bank-note Library," where they are packed in boxes and preserved for possible future reference during a period of five years. There are one hundred and twenty clerks employed in this one department; and so perfect is the system of registration, that if the number of a note be known to the head of this department, by referring to his books, can ascertain in a few minutes the date when and the banker through whom it was presented; and if within the period of five years, can produce the note itself for inspection. As to the "number" of a Bank-note, by the way, there is sometimes a little misconception, many people imagining that by quoting the bare figures on the face of a note they have done all that is requisite for its identification. This is not the case. Bank-notes are not numbered consecutively ad infinitum, but in series of one to one hundred thousand, the different series being distinguished as between themselves by the date, which appears in full in the body of the note, and is further indicated to the initiated, by the letter and numerals prefixed to the actual number. Thus $\frac{25}{O}$ 90758 on the face of a note indicates the note in question is No. 90758 of the series printed on May 21, 1883, which date appears in full in the body of the note $\frac{69}{N}$, in like manner indicates that the note forms part of a series printed on February 19, 1883. In "taking the number" of a note, therefore, either this prefix or the full date, as stated in the body of the note, should always be included.

The "Library" of cancelled notes—not to be confounded with the Bank Library proper—is situated in the Bank vaults, and we are indebted to the Bank-note Librarian for the following curious and interesting statistics respecting his stock. The stock of paid notes for five years—the period during which, as before stated the notes are preserved for reference—is about in number. They fill thirteen thousand four hundred boxes, about eighteen inches long ten wide, and nine deep. If the notes could be placed in a pile one upon another, they would reach to a height of five and two-third miles. Joined end to end they would form a ribbon twelve thousand four hundred and fifty miles long, or half way round the globe; if laid so as to form a carpet, they would very nearly cover Hyde Park. The original value is somewhat over seventeen hundred and fifty millions, and their weight about ninety-one tons. The immense extent of space necessary to accomodate such a mass in the bank vaults may be imagined. The place, with its piles on piles of boxes reaching far away into dim distance, looks like some gigantic wine-cellar or bonded warehouse.

SEVENTY-SEVEN MILLION SEVEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIVE THOUSAND

As each day adds, as we have seen, about fifty thousand notes to the number, it is necessary to find some means of destroying those which have passed their allotted term of preservation. This is done by fire, about four hundred thousand notes being burnt at one time in a furnace specially constructed for that purpose. Formerly, from some peculiarity in the ink with which the notes were printed, the cremated notes burnt into a solid blue clinker; but the composition of the ink has been altered, and the paper now burns to a fine gray ash. The fumes of the burning paper are extremely dense and pungent; and to prevent any nuisance arising from this cause, the process of cremation is carried out at dead of night, when the city is comparatively deserted. Further, in order to mitigate the density of the fumes, they are made to aescend through a shower of falling water, the chimney shaft being fitted with a special shower bath arrangement for this purpose.

Passing away from the necropolis of dead and buried notes, we visit the Treasury, whence they originally issued. This is a quiet-looking room, scarcely more imposing in appearance than the butler's pantry in a West-end mansion, but the modest looking cupboards with which its walls are lined are gorged with hidden treasure. The possible value of the contents of this room may be imagined from the fact that a million of money, in notes of one thousand pounds, forms a packet only three inches thick. The writer has had the privilege of holding such a parcel in his hand, and for a quarter of a minute imagining himself a millionaire—with an income of over

THIRTY THOUSAND PER ANNUM FOR LIFE!

The same amount might occupy even less space than the above, for Mr. Francis tells a story of a lost note for thirty thousand pounds, which, turning up after a lapse of many years, was paid by the Bank twice over! We are informed that notes of even a higher value than this have been printed, but the highest denomination now issued is one thousand pounds

In this department is kept a portion of the Bank's stock of golden coin in bags of one thousand pounds each. This amount does not require a very large bag for its accommodation, but its weight is considerable, amounting to two hundred and fifty-eight ounces twenty penuyweights, so that a million in gold would weigh some tons. In another room of this department—the Weighing Office—are seen the machines for detecting light coin. These machines are marvels of ingenious mechanism. Three or four hundred sovereigns are laid in a long brass scoop or semi-tube, of such a diameter as to admit them comfortably, and self-regulating to such an incline that the coins gradually slide down by their own weight on to one plate of a little balance placed at its lower extremity. Across the face of this plate two little bolts make alternate thrusts, one to the right, one to the left, but at slightly different levels. If the coin be of full weight, the balance is held af equipoise, and the right-hand bolt making its thrust, pushes it off the plate and down an adjacent tube into the receptacle for full-weight coin. If, on the other hand, the coin is ever so little "light," the balance naturally rises with it. The right-hand bolt makes its thrust as before, but this time passes harmlessly beneath the coin. Then come the thrust of the left-hand bolt, which, as we have said, is fixed at a fractionally higher level, and pushes the coin down a tube on the opposite side, through which it fall into the light coin receptable. The coins thus condemned are afterwards dropped into another machine, which defaces them by a cut half way across their diameter at a rate of

TWO HUNDRED A MINUTE.

The weighing machines, of which there are sixteen, are actuated by a small atmospheric engine in one corner of the room, the only manual assistance required being to keep them supplied with coin. It is said that sixty thousand severeigns and half-sovereigns can be weighed here in a single day The weighing machine in question is the invention of Mr. Cotton, a former governor of the Bank, and among scientific men is regarded as one of the most striking achievements of practical mechanics.

In the Bullion department we find another weighing-machine of a different character, but in its way equally remarkable. It is the first of its kind, having been designed specially foa the Bank by Mr. James Murdoch Napier, by whom it has been patented. It is used for the purpose of weighing bullion, which is purchased in this department. Gold is brought in bars of about eight inches long, three wide, and one inch thick. A bar of gold of these dimensions will weigh about two hundred ounces, and is worth, if pure, about eight hundred pounds. Each bar when brought in is accompanied by a memorandum of its weight. The question of quality is determined by the process of assaying: the weight is checked by mnans of the weighing-machine we have referred to. This takes the form of an extremely massive pair of scales, working on a beam of immense strength and solidity, and is based, so as to be absolutely rigid, on a solid bed of concrete. The whole stands about six feet high by three wide, and is inclosed in an air-tight plate-glass case a sash in which is raised when it is desired to use the machine. The two sides of the scale are each kept permanently loaded, the one with a single weight of three hundred and sixty ounces, the other with a number of weights of various sizes to the same amount. When it is desired to test the weight of a bar of gold, weights to the amount stated in the corresponding memorandum, less half an ounce, are removed from the latter scale, and the bar of gold substituted in their place. Up to this point the beam of the scale is kept perfectly horizontal, being maintained in that position by a mechanical break: but now a stud is pressed, and by means of delicate machinery, actutated by water-power, the beam is release. If the weight of the bar has been correctly stated in the memorandum, the scales which holds it should be exactly half an ounce in excess. This or any less excess of weight over the three hundred and sixty ounces in the opposite scale is instantly registered by the machine,a pointer travelling round a dial until it indicates the proper amount. the function of the machine, however, is limited to weighing half an ounce only. If the discrepancy between the two scales as loaded is greater than this, or if on the other hand the bar of gold is more than half an ounce less than the amount stated in the memorandum, an electric bell rings by way of warning, the pointer travels right round the dial, and returns to zero. So delicate is the adjustment, that the weight of half a penny postage stamp—somewhat less than half a grain— will set the hand in motion and be recorded on the dial.

The stock of gold in the bullion vault varies from one to

THREE MILLION POUNDS STERLING.

The bars are laid side by side on small flat trucks or barrows carrying one hundred bars each. In a glass case in this vault is seen a portion of the war indemnity paid by King Coffee of Ashantee, consisting of gold ornaments, a little short of standard fineness.

One of the first reflections that strike an outsider permitted to inspect the repository of so much treasure is, 'Can all this wealth be safe?' These heaps of precious metal, these piles of still more precious notes, are handled by the officials in such an easy-going, matter-of-course-way, that one would almost fancy a few thousands would scarcely be missed; and that a dishonest person had only to walk in and help himself to as many sovereigns or hundred pound notes as his pockets could accomodate. Such, however, is very far from being the case. The safeguards against robbeay, either by force or fraud, are many and elaborate. At night the Bank is guarded at all accessible points by an ample military force, which would no doubt give a good account of any intruder rash enough to attempt to gain an entrance. In the event of attack from without, there are stiding galleries which can be thrust out from the roof, and which would enable a body of sharpshooters to rake the streets in all directions.

Few people are aware that the Bank of England contains within its walls a graveyard, but such is nevertheless the fact. The Gordon riots in 1780, during which the Bank was attacked by a mob, called attention to the necessity for strengthening its defences. Competent authorities advised that an adjoining church, rejoicing in the appropriate name of St. Christopher-le-Stocks, was in a military sense a source of danger, and accordingly an Act of Parliament was passed to enable the directors to purchase the church and its appurtenances. The old Churchyard, tastefully laid out now forms what is known as the Bank "garden," the handsome "Court Room", or "Bank Parlor" abutting on one of its sides. There is a magnificent lime-tree, one of the largest in London, in the centre of the garden, and a tradition states that under this tree a former clerk of the Bank, eight feet high, lies buried. With this last, though not least of the curiosities of the Bank, we must bring the present article to a close. We had intended briefly to have referred to sundry eventful pages of its history; but these we are compelled, by considerations of space, to reserve for a future paper.

FOR THE FARMER

Cooking Food For Swine.

The cost of pork is greatly lessened by cooking the food for the hogs. Wormy apples, small potatoes, etc., will pay handsomely for the trouble of cooking It is the greatest fault of our pork production, that we feed corn almost exclusively. This motonous diet, rich in oil, must jeopardize health. It is as if a man ate nothing but fat meat and corn-bread. The value of cooked food does not depend altogether upon its nutritious contents. In cold weather much good is done by feeding hogs heated food. It warms up the body, and stimulates the digestive organs to vigorous action. It pays always to warm slops in cold weather. The main reason farmers do not feed more cooked food to their swine, is the fancied labor and trouble of preparing it. A good utensil is a large iron kettle, swung upon two poles of sufficiently strong wood. The bail is removed, and a piece of chain, forming a loop a foot long, is passed through each eye of the kettle, and over the respective pole. The poles are placed on forked sticks, set in the ground. The poles should be parallel, and as far apart as are the eyes of the kettle. Place near the kettle a large, light trough, made of two- inch pine boards, which may be situated in a small lot separated from the hog lot by a fence with a small gate. Old broken fence rails make excellent, cheap fuel: they ignite readily, give a quick, hot fire, and soon die down When the cooking is done, rake the fire to one side, and bring the trough partially under the kettle on that side from which the fire has been removed. Raise the pole from that side out of the crotches, and let it down. This will tilt the kettle on the edge of the trough, and most of the food will be deposited in it; the balance is easily scooped out with a board or pan. When only one pole is used, it is difficult to get the cooked food into the trough. After the food has been cooked sufficiently, open the gate in the fence, and let the hogs into the feast. Managed in this way the labor of cooking a kettle of food can be done in five minutes, and the only expense of making the ration is a few pieces of old rails.

Boiled small potatoes, mixed with meal, will cause pigs to grow and fatten. Give horses cut feed in the winter. Cut the hay and oat-straw together, and sprinkle on the meal; it saves the hay, utilizes the straw, and the meal itself does better service. Corn stalks should be cut for cattle. If you own an old horse, that has barely lived through the summer, it would be an act of mercy to put him out of the way now. He would otherwise eat a ton or more of hay before spring opens, and then be worthless. Keep salt before the cattle, or at least so convenient to them, that regular "saltings" will not be forgotten. Farmers should make a careful study of the feeding of store cattle. They make a mistake who feed simply to keep the animal alive through the winter. It requires two-thirds of a full ration to sustain life without growth, whereas the other third will produce growth, and yield a profit on all the feed. The animal, which comes out in good condition in the spring, has a long way the start of one that, from insufficient food must take a month on grass to get thrifty again.

Do not delay filling the ice-house, for a single day, after the ice is six inches thick and of good quality. Get out the year's supply of fire wood, and any logs needed for timber, lumber, etc.

Orchard and Fruit Garden.

Gather up all stakes, labels, boxes, and store whatever may be of future use, and make kindling wood of the rest....Surface drainage should be provided to carry off water from rains and thaws.....Young trees planted last fall or spring, need a mound of earth at the base of the trunk to steady them against the heavy blows, and also help to keep off mice....Cut cions in mild weather, always taking vigorous last season's shoots. Pack with sawdust or moss, first carefully labelling them....Strawberry beds, if not yet protected, should be covered with straw, bog hay, or leaves....Prune in mild spells, currants, gooseberries, grapevines, etc. If trees or small fruits are to be planted next spring, decide upon kinds, where they are to be bought, and order early ....Fruit, if stored in the house cellar in large quantities, may give off so much carbonic acid as to contaminate the air of the rooms above. Provide ventilation, connecting with a chimney if possible. Keep a thermometer in the fruit cellar to aid in maintaining a low temperature, just above freezing.....Manure should be drawn to the orchard while the ground is frozen, ready for spreading in early spring ....Gates and fences should be in condition to keep out animals....Rabbits are most readily kept from young trees, by sprinkling the trunks with blood. Set traps....The eggs of the tent caterpillar, which are glued to the twigs in a band near their ends, should be cut off and destroyed.

The Kitchen and Market Garden.

In most localities the weather has been favorable for doing spring work in the fall. Continue in mild spells, to do whatever will save time in the busy time of next spring....Cold frames, in a mild winter, require close watching. If the temperature is but slightly below freezing, air must be given every day. If the plants are not frozen when snow falls, the glass should be cleared of snow soon afterwards .....Spinach, kale, and onions, that are now in the ground, should have a moderate covering of straw, bog hay, or leaves. Roots in pitts, and celery in trenches, will need more covering up as the winter grows colder....Parsnips and salsify, if needed before spring, may be dug during the thaw that usually occurs this month, as also may horseradish....It is poor economy to sow seeds of uncertain quality. Overhaul the stock on hand, and reject all that are doubtful. Determine what seeds are to be bought, and order them. While parsnips, onions, and a few other seeds are uncertain if not of the growth of the previous year, cucumbers, squashes, and all of that family, will remain good for many years....Every source of manure supply should be watched, and nothing allowed to go to waste that will increase the value of the compost pile. The market gardener should be acquainted with all the manufactories in the vicinity, and ascertain the character of their refuse, with a view to securing it if of value.... Have all the implements in good working order. If any are beyond repair procure new ones. Make all home-made appliances, such as markers, dibbles, etc. Secure labels, tying materials for bunching vegetables, baskets, boxes for raising seedings, etc., etc.

Flower Garden and Lawn.

But little can be done here save to prevent injury to trees, etc. Have the snow plow in motion soon after a storm, as the labor of opening paths is much less when the snow lies lightly. Evergreen trees and hedges are often injured by snow, which collects in and breaks them. Shake or beat out accumulations of snow, before they harden. All proposed improvements in the grounds may be leisurely considered at this season, and if a plan of the grounds is made on paper, drawn to a scale, it will greatly fecilitate doing the work next spring.

SCIENCE.

In a recent number of the Journal of Inebriety, Dr. Napier shows that farinaceous foods are preferable to all others in the treatment of alcoholism. Maccaroni, beans, dried peas, and lentils, in his opinion antagonize in a marked degree the appetite for alcohol.

An inventive genius, after a long series of experiments, says the natural gas contains the chemical elements of whiskey, and he claims to have discovered a process by which it may be converted into first-class whiskey. Another man is making bogus butter out of the gas wells.

Professor Osborne Reynolds says that steel ropes as transmitters of power have a great advantage over shafts, because the stres on the surface will be uniform, and may be at least ten to fifteen times as great as with the shafts, say 100 feet per second, the rope is carried on friction pulleys, which may be at distances of 500 or 600 feet, so that the co-efficient of friction will not be more than 0.015, instead of 0.04.

In the Northeastern island of Terra del Fnego the Ua people, who in ermarry frequently with the more Southern Yahgans (as they are called by the English missionaries), are the tallest race on the globe, according to the French Mission to Cape Horn report, presented to the Academy of Science, Paris, by Dr. Hahn. In stock and speech this tall people appear closely related to the Patagonians of the Continent.

Professor Fitzgerald, of the University Experimental Science Association, Dublin, has published a paper on the magnetophone, a new form of which instrument has been devised by Mr. W. V. Dixon. In this a diaphragm removed from a telephone is placed in proximity to one end of a bar magnet, while at the other extremity of the magnet small masses of soft iron fixed radially are rotated. A note is produced at the diaphragm.

The height and velocity of clouds has been determined in England by means of photography. Two cameras, placed about 600 feet apart, are provided with instantaneous shutters simultaneously released by electricity. The observer measures the angle of inclination of the cameras and the position of the clouds as photographed on the two plates, and from these data a trigonometric calculation gives the distance and height of a cloud with great accuracy.

A great Swiss marine and pocket chronometer competition is now going on at Geneva, to last eighty-three days. A special stove, in which an invariable temperature can be maintained for several consecutive days, was built. For five days the chronometers placed therein will be kept at one temperature, which will afterwards be raised by degrees at a time from 5 deg. to 35 deg. Centigrade, and then reduced in like manner from 35 to 50 per cent.

A famous aeronaut says that no balloon has ever gone over a second sunset. The moment the sun goes down the gas condenses, and you get through the night better than the day. But the next day, in the presence of the sun, the gas expands and you mount to great elevations, but every mount the balloon makes cripples its power, and it is only a question of hours, if not minutes, how long you can keep up. If an aeronaut could have forty-eight hours of night he could travel a great distance. The highest rate of speed he had ever attained, even with a strong wind blowing, was eighty miles an hour.

"I have read every book in my husband's library. I really don't know what to do for something to read," said a newly married woman to a friend. "Why don't you get another husband?" was the reply of the other party, who had some experience. The above is said to have occurred in Boston.

A LOST ART.

How the Millstone has been relegated out of use.

A number of heavy white millstones were piled up on one of the docks along the river. They were consigned to some interior town forty or fifty miles from the city, and were of the style, make, and finish so long in use. An old man, with a slouch hat pulled down so far over his face that his small, fast blinking eyes from view, stood a little way back on the wharf and talked to a young man he had halted and asked for a match. "Millstones have pretty nearly gone out of date," said he, with a half mournful air, "and with them have gone the occupation I have followed for thirty years. See here," and the old man crowded his hat over on to the back part of his head and lifted his face for the first time into plain sight. It was pitted all over with numberless ugly dimples, depressions, and cuts, and looked as if he might have some day have had the small pox,

"Do you know how that was done?" he asked. The young man did not know. "By picking mill-stones," was the quickly volunteered information. No one who has ever followed the business of giving these stones that keen cut texture that enables them to crush and grind grain, can escape these scars. Why, my face is literally filled with the little particles of steel and stone, and my eyes have seasons of paining me terribly. But the profession has about run its race. In ten years the dictionary makers will put the stereotyped word 'obsolete' after the noun 'millstone. Modern inventions have relegated the time-honored millstones to oblivion. New processes have been discovered for extracting the wheat from flour, beside which the millstone has no show."

The young man began to grow interested. He drew his companion into the doorway of a little switch shanty, secured permission for the two sit down a moment before the fire, and asked him to continue.

"Nowadays," said the old man, "wheat is crushed beneath rollers and the flour produced is much superior to the old make. Then, too, the bran that was once thought to be almost worthless is now sifted by a new process and a quality of flour is separated that is worth forty or fifty cents more per sack than the common variety. You have heard that the best part of a potato lay just beneath the skin. Recent scientific experiments have shown that it is true of all vegetables; especialy of the wheat. This suggested the construction of a sieve that would separate the little particles of the kernel that cling to the shuck when it has been broken up and ground to pieces. It has been successful, and the flour secured in this way, though small in quantity, is of superb quality. This latter process was the only means possible by the new method of grinding wheat that has been generally adopted by all the large mills in the country. But in the meantime my occupation has been gradually undermined. Once in a while I have a call to go somewhere into the country and dress a stone, but it is very seldom."

"Most of the millstones in use in this country are of French burr, a silicious rock, containing many small rough cavities, and requiring less preparation than a perfectly plain stone. It is quarried in the geological district known as the 'Paris basin.' A quarry has been worked for many years in the valley of the Savannah river, about one hundred miles above the city of Savannah, and the quality of stones secured are said to be almost equal to those produced in France. The lower stone has generally a smooth grinding surface. The moving stone is hollowed toward the centre to allow the material ground room to flow freely between the grinding surfaces. The faces of both stones have to be cut with straight grooves in direction inclined radii. The edges of the grooves are thus given a cutting action somewhat resembling that of scissor blades, and a tendency to force the grain outward towards the circumference is secured, thus accelerating the feeding and avoiding choking. To do this work perfectly requires an enormous amount of practice, an and apprentice must serve four or five years on cheap stones before he is allowed to touch the most valuable ones. Machines were once invented to do the cutting, but they were not a success. It was a hard business to learn, and its day was very profitable. Modern innovations, however, have no sympathy for workingmen, and in ten years it is doubtful if there will be a millstone in use in this country.—[Cleveland Leader.

Studying the Past.

We all have an innate craving to grasp some part or parcel of the tissue of the past, whether we express it by collecting Damascus sword blades. Aleppo prayer rugs, old manuscripts or otherbric-a-brac, or whether we "notch off a fragment of the Acropolis or carve one's name among the ruins of the Forum." We are always trying to revive and rehabilitate the dead past, "to know something more of the vanity and pettiness, the fear and longing of those weary men and women, the memorial of whose lives has been trampled out."

Electricity as a Brake.

A new electric brake, recently invented by an American, named Walker, and which is already in use in America, was lately tried on a tramway between Turin and Piosasslo, with remarkable results. It is reported that by means of this brake two cars, running at a speed of about twenty-two miles per hour, were stopped in the short spice of six seconds, and within a distance of twenty yards. This, if reliable, is a great achievement certainly, and will doubtless lead to further and more extensive experiments, and possibly to its general adoption. The brake is at present being exhibited in the Turin Exhibition.

Playing Cards of the Past.

Playing cards, of course, form the staple of the show [in one apartment of the Health Exhibition] but who ever dreamed that such a collection of cards of all ages aed countries—from England to the far East—could be brought together? The walls are literally covered with them, and the tables bear man yrare and curious specimens. There are French caricature cards printed from copper plate and colored by hand, bearing the date 1818; German astronomical cards, with the signs of the constellations, colored by hand, of the seventeenth-century; German and French heraldic playing cards, with the coats of arms and blazoning of the Princes and nobles of Europe, bearing the date 1620. There is an English pack of 52 picture cards, each card illustrative of the virtues and vices of mankind; the date of this interesting pack is 1720. There are French playing cards with dance music, and English and French cards for teaching geography to the children of the latter part of the seventeenth century. One pack of cards, not satisfied with England and Wales, profess to teach the geography to the world. This appears to have a common mode of instruction in the easy-going times of Charles II. There is a very amusing pack of caricature cards of the year 1745. One set of different kind commemorates the murder of Sir Edmundberry Godfrey and the Popish plot of 1679. As Titus Oates figures here as a hero, it is only fair to assume that the cards were designed previous to the exposure of Oates's villainy. A pack of cards bearing the date 1720 caricatures the persons and incidents of the South Sea Bubble. Another pack, dated 1710, gives a series of portraits of eminent Greeks and Romans. Sporting is represented on cards designed as far back as 1705—a very beautiful example of engraving of that period. A book describing fortune by playing cards contains some curious woodcuts, many of them evidently copied from the very rare pack of cards known as the Cartes de Baldini. Then we have the learned Dr. T. Murner's cards for teaching logic and jurisprudence with which it is said he was so successful as a teacher that he narrowly escaped being burned as a sorcerer. The issue of 1509 and the French reprint may be seen together in Old London, and near to them is a very curious and rare fortune telling book of cards made in Venice in 1607. Among the greatest rarities are two cards from the pack known as the "Chotto" cards of 1480 or thereabouts, and four cards from a pack of circular playing cards made at Cologne about 1470, China, Japan, and Hindustan are also represented by various examples of the curious playing cards of those countries, and visitors to the interesting exhibit should take note of the pack of Tarrochini cards of Bologna. The Makers of Playing Cards Company show packs of their cards issued for the years 1872 and 1873, bearing the arms of the company. The Mittelli, which are fine examples of design of the period. It is amusing to see here (when we remember the authorship which is sometimes assigned to playing cards) that a thick illustrated quarto shown in one of the cases is a treatise devoted to teaching Bible history by means of playing cards. Worthy of notice is the pack of cards by Christopher Blanchard, "maker in ordinary to his Majesty George III.," of 1783, and those who care to see what has been done to improve playing cards in a hundred years may compare this pack with that of the Playing Card Makers of 1883, which is shown closely by it. A proclamation of Charles I., protecting the playing card makers of London against foreign invasion, is shown on the window shutter of the Old Rose Inn. This collection is both interesting and valuable as showing that for 400 years at least playing cards have formed an important part of the diversions of the civilized world, and it is worthy of remark, also, that they have been used in no insignificant way as an aid to scholastic education. The collection and arrangement is due to the energy of Mr. George Clulow, a member of the Court of Assistants of the company, whose intimate knowledge on the subject of playing cards, antiquarian, historical, and practical, has been used to produce an exhibit of a most novel and attractive character.

About Paris Gambling-Houses.

A Parisian journal has been making some inquiries regarding the number of gaming-houses and gambling hells in the "capital of civilization" and the amount of money which changes hands in them. If the information be trustworthy, it is indeed startling. There are twenty-four of these tripots in Paris, and between six and seven millions sterling are computed to have been lost there during the last five years. The minimum profits of the banks in the clubs are put down at £240 daily, and in the less select gambling-houses at £40. Taking the average at £80 per day, the total for the five years comes out at the respectable figure of three and a-half millions sterling. Nearly another two and a half millions are set down as the five years' "pickings" of the croupiers and preteurs. Some of these men make enormous incomes, and it is certainly well within the mark to put down their receipts at an average of £4,000 per annum. Then there is another half-million for the salaries of administrators and their staffs. Truly, it would appear that, if the French Government is to suppress Mont Carlo, it must at the same time suppress the private and semi-private gambling-hells which stand at the very doors of the Elysee.

INDIA AND CANADA.

The Advantages of the Dominion—An Army Veteran's Experience.

Toronto Mail.

The Earl of Dufferin, our late Governor-General, is evidently a man of destiny. His appointment to the Viceroyalty of India is a deserved honor, and he will have the best wishes of every loyal Canadian. But he has no sinecure. English rule in India is a difficult thing to maintain—as the late Postmaster-General Fawcett often pointedly told Parliament—for it is one civilization attempting to rule another on its own domain. Moreover, the ruling class will always be in a minority because the climate is so exacting that Englishmen cannot colonize the country in any considerable numbers. Adults cannot long abide there without a change of climate, and children born there of Caucasian parents, invariably die if they are kept in the country over six years.

India has many natural advantages over other English dependencies, but Canada has a more healthful climate, and she is not vexed, with the problems of the government of aliens.

The heat of the lowlands of India is something dreadful, the average being over 80 degrees In the dry season the glass often registers 120°. Most of the wealthy class can flee to the mountains in summer, but the army officers and men have to endure it. As a consequence the mortality is very great.

Not long ago it was our privilege to converse at some length with Mr. T. B. Deacon, of Goderich, who has served in Her Majesty's Indian army over 17 years. To our inquiry on how the climate affects the health of foreigners, he said:—

"Well, one does not notice the change at first unless the dry and hot season is on. Indeed I endured the damp hot of winter and the dry heat of summer very well for many years. Not till 1877, did I begin to feel knocked up entirely. Then I lost flesh rapidly, my appetite was that capricious that I could find nothing agreeable, my bowels were stupidly torpid, my spirit was gone directly I wanted any vim. I got that yellow that I looked very like a lemon, and my legs swelled in size to an elephant's. And sure enough, I was weak! No, I had no pain at all. I was simply quietly wasting away, my system being completely saturated with malaria None of the army physicians could help me, and I finally went home for treatment, but the London medical men gave it up when they saw me and learned that I had been soldering in India. Quite given out I came to Canada, but got no help here, either. I had about made up my mind that it was all up with me but by a very fortunate turn of circumstances I began to use the famous Warner's Safe Cure, and when I had taken nine bottles I got to be a strong and healthy man, having run from 92 to 142 lbs., the most I ever weighed. I have not had to take a drop of medicine in over a twelve-month. No, I shall not go back to India and I don't advise any of my friends either here or at home to go there. The Caucasian has no business there whatever."

Some of us may at times feel like finding a little fault with our cold Dominion, but take it all in all we have a climate much preferable to that of "India's coral strands," and we still stick to our own country.

Cold feet and hands are certain indications of imperfect circulation of the blood. De Carsen's Stomach bitters promotes the circulation keeps the bowels regular and induces good health. Large bottles at 50 cents.

"Halloo!" shouted one boy to another, whom he saw running wildly down the street. "Halloo! are you training for a race?" "No," called back the flying boy. "I'm racing for a train."

What 10 Cents will do

A 10 cent bottle of Polson's Nerviline will cure neuralgia or headache. A ten cent bottle of Nerviline will cure toothache or faceache. A 10 cent sample bottle of Nerviline, is sufficient to cure colds, diarrhœa, spasms, dysentery, &c. Nerviline is just the thing to cure all pains, whether internal or external. Buy at your druggist a 10 cent sample of Nerviline, "the great pain cure." Safe, prompt, and always effectual. Large bottles at any drug store, only 25 cents.

A little town up in New York has a skating rink that they call the "Niagara." It is supposed that they call it that because the people go there to see the "falls."

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinay succes that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star.

"Love begets love," sings the old song, but how are you going to reconcile that with the homeopathic claim that like cures like?

The same discrimination is not indicated by the so-called respectable druggist when that wonderful corn cure, PUTNAM'S PAINLESS CORN EXTRACTOR, is asked for. Yule-Tide.

We meet to-night—a band of far off friends;
Long severed hearts whose lives have separate ends.
Rich friends and poor, whose hearths are bright or drear;
But pledge them all, "Good speed!" since they are here!
Why came the Child, who this fair night was born
But that dark lives should sometimes see the morn?
Shake hands; and, parting, sing Love's song again:
"Peace unto all on earth, and good will towards men!"

Perchance some heart from thy glad board hath ranged;
Some heart from thee by grief or chance estranged,
Pledge him "God speed!" at this thy Christmas cheer.
As in old days when he, in love, was near.
Why came the Child who this fair night was born,
But to bring back the feet that roam forlorn?
Let be the buried Past, and softly say:
"God speed, poor child, upon thy solitary way!

Perchance to-night some fading eyes are here,
Who scarce may see another dying year;
Pledge them "God speed" upon their onward way,
A sweet "good night" until the break of day:
Why came the Child who this fair night was born,
But from their brows to loose the dying thorn
"Good night and may the star of Bethlehem Shed, when they fall asleep, the same pure light on them!"

Perchance to night the vacant chair is seen,
On one whose grave still blooms in memory green;
Pledge him "God speed" as though he still were here,
Though gone before thee into life's New Year:
Why came the Child who this fair night was born,
But for Heaven's barns to reap His golden corn?
Shed not a tear, but when ye hear the swells,
Echoing through heaven of merry Yuletide bells,
Rejoice, and lay upon his grave a crown of immortelles!

BABY'S CHRISTMAS TREE.

BY HAROLD W. RAYMOND.

PART I.

A queer baby that. A strange anomalous mixture of mental infancy and physical manhood.

When James Smith and Lizzie Ashwood were married the sun of their existence shone in a cloudless sky. The husband was rich, handsome and accomplished—and more. He was a man. He had sown his wild oats in reasonable measure and reaped a fair crop of regrets, and his experience with the world had given him a strength of character he never would have obtained otherwise, besides teaching him to appreciate to their fullest extent the rare beauties of truth and purity. And these he found in his lovely bride, who coupled a warm temperament with the clear light of a woman's brightest jewel, and who did what is either woman's greatest wisdom or sublimest folly—idolized her husband.

In short, the Smiths were as happy a couple as could be found in the city, and society had no brighter ornament upon her diadem than they.

The accident occurred in the third year of their wedded life. It was a common-place accident enough, an unmanageable horse, a swift-moving locomotive—a wrecked carriage, and a man lying pale and cold, and covered with blood, by the roadside. And when James Smith's unconscious form was carried home on a stretcher, it was an open question whether it could be called a man or a corpse.

For three days and nights Lizzie watched by her husband's side, disobedient to all command to the contrary.

"If he opens his eyes" she had said, "whether it be to live or die, mine must be the first thing he sees."

"God bless you, my dear!" exclaimed the old physician that had doctored the Smiths for two generations. "God bless you, my dear, we will nurse him together."

So together they watched, and nursed, and battled with the terrible stupor which had imprisoned his faculties, taking turns in sleeping, but neither leaving the sick man's chamber for any length of time. It was a weary while of waiting, but their love knew no flagging; this heroic woman, this dear, patient, loving old doctor! But at length the poor battered brain awoke to the consciousness that the attendant nerves were in pain, and testified its appreciation of the fact by a good honest groan which rang through the room in pleasant contrast to the solemn silence which had hitherto held possession of his form.

"Now, look sharp, my child," said the dear old physician, voice and hand trembling as he seized the wrist of the sufferer. "He may open his eyes at any moment."

How tenderly she bent the brown eyes—so beautiful, but oh, so weary—to catch the first faint gleam of recognition! It was a glance of wife and mother combined. As she watched, pressing her hand against her fiercely beating heart, there came a change in the face before her; the muscles were contracted into an expression of pain, and then after a moment the eyes were slowly unclosed and gazed vacantly and without recognition into hers. She poured into them the great wealth of her heart, but her imploring glances met with no answering ones. In their stead came a sour, peevish expression, and in a thin, childish voice, which bore no resemblance to the manly bass of James Smith, he cried out:

"Baby hungry. Do you hear? Baby hungry, I say."

"James. My darling! Do you not know me?"

"Baby hungry. Oh-h-h! Give baby eat."

"Doctor, what does he mean?" cried Lizzie, turning in agony toward the old physician. "O why does he talk so strangely?"

The old physician was now trembling visibly. Professional habit struggled vainly with personal feeling, and he found it impossible to veil his emotions. He bent over the prostrate form, and spoke to it in a voice that he could not for the life of him control.

"James, my lad, you have not forgotten me, Doctor White, your old friend, have you? Look at me well, my boy; don't be in a hurry."

No answer but the old one; "Baby hungry; give baby eat!"

Suddenly the voice of the doctor changed to the sweetly silly tone in which the best of men are wont to speak to children.

"Is'e baby hungry?" he said. "Well, 'e little baby shall be fed; yes he shall. Shall old Whitey look after his own baby boy? Shall old Whitey give his baby some pepper drops?"

A sudden flash of intelligence came into the invalid's eyes, at the sound of the word "Whitey," and when the words "pepper drops" were uttered he clapped his hands together and crowed with delight.

As for the loving old doctor, whose experiment had been only too successful, he broke down entirely, and turning aside his head, fell to sobbing like the veriest baby in the land. To Lizzie's quick intuition the scene needed no interpreter, and without a sound she sank upon the floor and quietly fainted away,

PART II.

This happened a little over three years prior to the time of our story, and during the intervening time Lizzie's life was absorbed in the trying occupation of caring for Baby. Three years! Easy enough to write the words, but hard to suffer them when coupled with imprisonment. But it is not my purpose to dwell upon the miseries of her lot—a task for which my heroine would not thank me; for though it was a constant torture in seeing the man she loved changed into a mental child, his brain living over the infant days and making him a constant source of worriment, Lizzie never allowed herself to succumb to the darkness which enshrouded her life. With the heroic measure of courage, which all true women who love possess, she rose above the grief that hung upon her heart, and made her self-enforced incarceration a thing of laughter and song.

Lizzie's theory was that by patient teaching she could slowly drag her husband's brain from the gulf which it had tumbled. In her secret heart she ed that they would some day reach a point where the missing link of memory lay, and then suddenly all would come back to him, and she would be the proud possessor of a twice won husband. Perhaps it was this belief that gave her courage to face her task, for hope is a powerful stimulant. It is very probable that this secret faith was a little in the nature of a chimera, but who can help honoring Lizzie for holding fast by it?

In the three years following the accident, her success was not of a very startling kind, but there was at least a gain. Baby soon learned to know and love the sweet face which was so constantly before him—to love it as a child loves its mother—and after a somewhat protracted struggle, to obey her also. This was a very necessary lesson, for Baby's hands were mischief-loving, and being very strong hands, he must look upon her as a master, or she never could get along with him

The lesson of obedience being learned, the patient teacher set to work to seek the broken ends of memory, and if possible to bind them together once more. Day after day, with a patience that was marvellous, she labored at her task; night after night she poured out a prayer for strength, never giving up the hope which glowed like a burning coal in her bosom.

People wondered that a society woman, young and beautiful, and accomplished, should give up her social pleasures for such a hopeless, thankless task; but I tell people, that society women are the kind that do this thing when their hearts are touched. I do not join hands with those who satirize those upon whom fortune has smiled, for I believe this weakness lies in their circumstances. Give them an opportunity and they are Florence Nightingales and Lizzie Ashwoods.

I wish the scoffers at society women could have peeped into the pretty home which had become such a prison house for my heroine. To see the great man-baby plying her with the most foolish questions, which she never failed to answer, though he forgot and repeated them within a few minutes; to see them pouring so industriously over A, B, C, which he never could remember, though he tried so hard; to see her spinning his top, or amusing him with a doll or jump-jack, while he sat upon the floor clapping his hands and laughing like the veriest babe in the land; or when in the dusk of approaching evening he knelt upon the floor beside her, gazing into her face as she sang sweet songs to him. If sights like these would not make you bow in reverence, there is a certain bump in your head that needs developing. The singing hours were especially touching; for music seemed to come nearer the lost link of memory than anything else, and Lizzie often noticed with a fluttering heart that sometimes a far-off questioning look came into the great gray eyes as her soft voice rose and fell in gentle song, as if he were striving himself to catch up the broken ends, and she sang with redoubled energy, throwing her very soul into her voice.

But Christmas was coming, and Lizzie had promised to give Baby a Christmas tree. She had told him all about the beautiful Santa who brought to good children an immense amount of uncompressible material down an exceedingly small chimney-hole and the big hands had clapped together with such delight that she determined that Santa Claus should come to Baby, whatever might betide.

I cannot tell all the preparations for that Christmas tree, delightful though the task would be, for a hard-hearted editor warns me that I am apt to be long-winded and tedious when I get to wrestling with print. How she struggled to keep young Mr. Inquisitive out of the fateful chamber while the carpenter was putting up the tree; how she stole away from him at unexpected moments to stick on stray ornaments, rushing back in a violent hurry lest he should follow her! It required a great deal of sharp manœuvering on her part to get the magic fruit upon the evergreen without attracting his attention, but she succeeded in doing it, and the Christmas tree was at length ready for lighting.

On Christmas Eve, after the supper and evening songs had been concluded, Lizzie coaxed Baby into undressing and dressing Dolly in the parlor while she slipped up stairs, and with the help of her maid got the tree lighted and burning merrily. Then going to the head of the stairs she called to Baby, who, obedient to her voice, came running up to meet her.

Imagine, if you can, the unbounded astonishment and delight of our huge infant at seeing a real Christmas tree; as if, poor fellow! he had not seen a score of them in his normal childhood! Like a child who sees the starry evergreen for the first time, twinkling in its fantastic way, his mind seemed to halt between pleasure and awe, and while he showed his delight by sundry chucklings and crowings, he clung very fast to Lizzie's hand at the same time. After a few moments though, he became accustomed to the novel objects, and sitting down upon the floor, began to play quite contentedly with some bright colored bon bons, that Lizzie pulled from the tree for him.

Lizzie never remembered exactly what called her from the room; she had just left it for a moment intending to return without delay, when she heard the sound of something falling, and then a cry of terror in Baby's voice. Rushing back into the chamber she was almost paralyed with horror at seeing the Christmas tree lying upon the floor, and Baby's light clothing in a blaze. For an instant her limbs refused to do their office, but Lizzie's schooling had taken all the nonsense out of her, and her presence of mind returned almost on the second. Without a word she ran into her own bed room, and tore a blanket from the bed; but before she could get back again Baby's tall form dashed into the hall, and with a long cry fell the whole length of the stairs and lay, a motionless mass, on the floor below.

When the old doctor reached the house, he found all that remained of Baby lying upon Lizzie's bed—dead. At least so it seemed to the unprofessional eye, but doctors are not so easily satisfied.

"His pulse beats," cried the physician who immediately began to tear away the charred clothing from Baby's chest and to chafe and handle various portions of his body.

"I find no broken bones," he said, "nor any serious bruises. See! Lizzie. He breaths! he moves! quick my dear, he is about to open his eyes."

Lizzie was quickly bending above him, and sure enough Baby's eyes slowly opened and gazed into hers. Baby eyes, do we say? What is it that makes her stagger and turn so pale, so that the doctor has to prevent her falling? It is not Baby's voice that speaks to her in such tender accents:—

"Why, Lizzie darling, what makes you so pale and weary looking? And why am I so weak and full of pain? Have I been ill, little wife?"

"Yes, James, you have been very ill?"

"Well, I shall get well now. Tell me all about it, dear. But not now—I am too tired.

And James Smith kept his word and got well. After this will you call him a myth—that historical character, I mean who "jumped into another bush and scratched them in again?"

SKATING FLIRTATION.

Standing on your nose, "I have no objection to a mother-in-law."

Lying on your back, "Assist me."

Hitting back of your head with your heel, "I am gone."

Suddenly placing your legs horizontally on the floor like the letter V indicates, "I am paralyzed."

Punching your neighbor on the stomach with your left foot, "I am on to your little game."

A backward flip of the heels and sudden cohesion of the knees to the floor indicates, "May I skate the next music with you?"

STRANGE CLAIRVOYANCE.

The Wonderful Powers Vouchsafed to an Invalid in Her Last Illness.

The following incidents happened during the last illness of a relative of the writer, and have never before been published. The deceased was a young married woman, about the age of 32 She left one child. Her husband was a mechanic, and she herself was by trade a coat-maker, at which occupation she worked until about three weeks before her death. She was a pleasant-tempered woman, the daughter of a well-to-do farmer in New Hampshire, brought up in the usual plain manner of the region: When she first ceased her work and acknowledged herself an invalid her symptoms were feverishness and an unusual activity of mind, which was at first called flightiness, then hysterics, and later insanity. As a matter of fact, however, she was entirely normal in her mental action up to the very last, excepting in the matter of clairvoyance. She was cheerful and happy. She did not appear to have any serious functional disturbance outside of the brain. Soon after she was taken sick she told her husband: "I am much sicker than the doctor thinks me; I am going to die pretty soon. I don't mean that I am really sick, for I am not; but I am going to die, that is all.' She made complete arrngements for her funeral, and gave directions for paying the expenses out of her own money in the bank. She told her husband one day: I am going to die. Now it won't hurt me any. but I know of course that you will soon marry again. Only if I were you I would wait awhile because it will look better; otherwise the neighbors will think that you do not care for me, but I know you do." A few days latter she said: Never mind what I said the other day about marrying again; it won't make the least bit of difference to me you can marry just as soon as you like. She sent for several of her relatives who had become estranged in family differences, and had them make up their quarrels. In this vein of cheerful content her life ebbed away without any well-defined reason.

The queer thing in her sickness was the development of genuine clairvoyance of a kind which no theory satisfactorily explains. Upon one occasion her mother came in the room after having left it for a few moments and found her making her bed. She said: "Emma, you ought not to do that; let me do it.' "Oh, no;" she said, "I am strong enough to do it. Aunt Mercy is coming down. She just started a few minutes ago, and you know how she hates to find anything in disorder.' After a look in the glass the invalid returned to the bed, and in a few moments had the satisfaction of Aunt Mercy's approval. Nothing was thought of this at the time, but a few days later another case happened. The family doctor could make nothing of her sickness, and disposed of it under that convenient carry-all "hysterics." So, without her knowledge her mother sent to a town some thirty miles away for a more skilful physician. a relative of the family. The next morning as she and her mother were together she suddenly remarked: "Why there is Dr. Lathrop just getting off the cars How fast he walks." Then a few minutes later, she laughed and said: "Why, how fast the doctor does walk; and he is coming the long way round, too. Why don't he take the short cut?" Presently the doctor came in, out of breath, when she immediathly said: "Oh, I saw you running; but why didn't you take the short cut? But of course you wouldn't know."

Another day she said to her mother, "What made you tell father to come down here to day? He is too lame to walk so far?" Her mother replied that she had not done so, and that she had no idea that he would come. "Oh, yes," said Emma, "he is started and he is just passing Mr. Smith's now." So she went on from time to time, telling how far he had got, until at the end he came in, just as she had seen him. One day she said to her aunt, who was with her, "Uncle Jo has just started to come up to see me, but what did he get those blue pants for?" Uncle Jo lived about forty miles away. Her aunt said, "I don't dnow. I should think Jo would look well in blue." Then the invalid said, "Oh, yes, he has got a blue coat. Well, it is becoming to him." After a little while she said: "He is now opposite Ipswich, but he will not stop." When the train arrived Uncle Jo was on it, in the new blue suit, as she had seen him. When he came in she said: "What made you get off on the wrong side of the train at P.? I thought you would get left." Uncle Jo owned up to having gotten off upon the wrong side at the junction and to having had a narrow escape from being left.

Upon another day she said to her mother, "I am going to have a party this week; Aunt Lizzie will wear her new black silk, and she has the funniest new collar that I ever saw." She then described the collar to her mother, who humored her, and said: "Oh, no, Emma, I guess I would not have the party this week." "No. I guess I will put it off until next week.' said Emma. "Then Aunt Abbey will have to get her new dress done." A day or two later she said: "Aunt Lizzie is coming here; she is at Ipswich, and is coming here on her way home:" Then after a few minutes, "I am so sorry; she has just decided that she will not come."

The "party" was her funeral. The new dress and the strange coller were worn, and Aunt Lizzie had been at Ipswich when Emma saw her there, and had intended to visit her but changed her mind. The incidents here given are true. They are but samples of many others which took place during this strange sickness. No autopsy was allowed It was the opinion of the distant physician that her disease was cerebral. But in what way disease could operate to liberate the sense from their customary bondage to time and space the physician had no opinion to offer. The writer will add that a cousin of the deceased had in childhood the gift of seeing friends at remote distances by the aid of a "magic stone" held in a hat, into which he looked. The faculty was tested at the time, and seemed to exist beyond dispute. It was lost at a later age.

A New Remedy for Diphtheria.

The medical world is just now all alive concerning a new discovery in the manner of treating diphtheria, commonly known as "croup" or "buffy angina." To Dr. Delthil we are indebted for this new improvement (says La Poussin). It appears that the idea was thought of to try on fowls the remedy intended for the cure of man. Mr. Weber reported to the Veterinary Society that he had experimented on a whole poultry-yard invaded by diphtheria. From the moment the treatment was adopted, all the fowls which were not ill were safe from infection, and the epidemic ceased immediately. The following is the treatment employed: "Turpentine and tar are mixed together, and the whole is burned in a well-closed house, where the victims of the disease are roosting. Immediately a thick, black smoke fills the place, converting the inmates into "regular sweeps," and shortly after the most favorable symptoms appear, viz., the detaching of the spurious membranes, the moisture of the mucus, and the result is a perfect cure in the majority of cases. This treatment, however dirty and strange, has been experimented on man and beast with great success. New trials are about to be made on a number of subjects.

Besides the way he hawks and spits is disgusting." "Don't break the engagement for that; tell him to take Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy. It will cure him completely." "Well, I'll tell him. I do hate to break it off, for in all other respects he's quite too charming." Of course it cured his catarrh.

OUR CHRISTMAS CAROL[S]

In days when books were rare [and] readers few, the carol singer was a m[ore] important person than he is now. To unlettered peasants, a "ballad in pr[int] was once a thing uncommon, and [they] flocked round the carol-seller with w[on]dering delight, not the less that he [sang his] song to a very doleful tune. Vill[age] schools and village choirs have enla[rged] the rustic knowledge, and improved [the] rustic ear. Most of our country paris[hes] can now supply their own carol sing[ers] and are less dependent on the travell[ing] venders of these Christian wares.

OUR CHRISTMAS CAROLS.

In days when books were rare and readers few, the carol singer was a more important person than he is now. To the unlettered peasants, a "ballad in print" was once a thing uncommon, and they flocked round the carol-seller with wondering delight, not the less that he often sang to a very doleful tune. Village schools and village choirs have enlarged the rustic knowledge, and improved the rustic ear. Most of our country parishes can now supply their own carol singers, and are less dependent on the travelling minstrels of these Christian wakes.

More than forty years ago, Hone, the author of the "Everyday Book," said that the old carols began to be spoken of as not belonging to this century, and yet so one, that I am aware of, has attempted a collection of these fugitive pieces." Few of the ancient carols are admitted into the modern hymn-books in common use, and so they seemed to be among the old things which were passing away. But Hone, in this matter, under-estimated the persistency of popular taste. With all their improvements in printing, and the progress of art, there is still a large demand, both in town and country, for the coarse broadsheets which form the stock-in-trade of the carol-singer.

We have made a collection of the old Christmas carols still printed and sung. They are indeed curiosities of religious literature. They nearly all come from the neighborhood of the Seven Dials, where several printing-presses keep up the annual supply. Chief among these is the notorious press of Jemmy Catnach, though now bearing the name of another printer. It is in Monmouth Court, Soho-street. Going down this busy mart of old clothes and old shoes, the entrance to Monmouth Court is on the left, about half-way from St. Giles's to the Seven Dials. Entering the court, a window with specimens of sentimental halfpenny and cut-throat looking stories marks the place where Catnach, the "Colburn and Bentley of his day," produced his "Seven Dials Literature." Other printers of similar broadsheets and serial stories are near; but a visit to one suffices to show the nature of the trade. The paper is flimsy, the type poor, the woodcuts (when they are almost all "illustrated" publications) coarse, and the colouring wild "beyond all rules of art." That such productions should have a large circulation is rather mortifying in these days of educational progress; but it is so for the supply can only equal the demand. In sale, the Christmas carols are printed as well as less reputable issues from the same presses. Hone once asked Batchelor, a printer of Christmas carols in Moorfields, whether he would not exchange his old-fashioned and rude woodcuts for better and more modern designs. "No," said Batchelor, "these are old favourites, and other would not please my customers so well." Mr. Hotten put a similar question to a Seven Dials printer, and received a similar answer. The cuts were certainly older than the accession to Pitt—of dying speech and ballad memory—but "the people who buy them wouldn't have them at all if the pictures were new. They'd say they weren't genuine, and I dares well have never printed 'em."

The broadsheets (in size usually about ten inches by ten inches) contain several carols, with a variety of illustrations. The coloured sheets are hideous daubs, and their sale may give a useful hint to those who may seek to supply a better article of the class. Each sheet has a general heading for the trade. Some of these headings are as follows: "The Sailor's Garland: a choice collection of the most esteemed carols;" "Divine Songs;" "Saviour of Mankind;" "Christmas drawing near at hand;" "Harp of Israel;" "The Nativity, a collection of excellent Christmas carols;" "The Messenger;" "The Evergreen; carols for the Christmas holidays." The last-named broadsheet we give just as it is printed, as a specimen of the whole:

God Rest You.

God rest you, merry gentlemen,
Let nothing you dismay,
Remember, Christ, our Saviour,
Was born on Christmas day,
To save poor souls from Satan's power,
Which long time had gone astray.
And 'tis tidings of comfort and joy.

God, that is our Father,
The blessed angels came
Unto certain shepherds
With tidings of the same—
That there was born in Bethlehem
The SON of GOD by name.
And 'tis tidings, etc.

"Fear not," said God's Angels,
"Let nothing you affright,
For there is born in Bethlehem
A pure Virgin bright;
Able to advance you,
And beat down Satan quite."
And 'tis tidings, etc.

The shepherds at these tidings
Rejoiced much in mind,
And left their flocks a feeding
In tempest, storms, and wind.
And straight they went to Bethlehem,
The Son of God to find.
And 'tis tidings, etc.

And when they came to Bethlehem,
Where our sweet Saviour lay,
Found him in a manger,
Where oxen fed on hay.
His blessed Virgin kneeling down
To the Lord did pray.
And 'tis tidings, etc.

Unto sudden joy and gladness
The Shepherds they were filled,
Of the babe of Israel
Were his mother mild.
They, "Upon this blessed day
The Scriptures are fulfilled."
And 'tis tidings, etc.

Unto the Lord sing praises
All you within this place;
And like true loving Christians
Each other then embrace,
For the merry time of Christmas
Is drawing on apace.
And 'tis tidings, etc.

God bless the rulers of this house
With great prosperity;
And many a merry Christmas
May they live again to see,
Amongst their friends and kindred
That live both far and near.
And God send us all a happy New Year.

St. Stephen's Day.

In friendly love and unity,
For good St. Stephen's sake,
Let us all this blessed day
To Heaven our prayers make—
That we with him the cross of Christ
May freely undertake.
And Heaven will bless you evermore.

Now, while we sit here banquetting,
Of dainties having store,
Let us not forgetful be
To cherish up the poor,
And give what is convenient
To the needy at the door.
And Heaven will bless you evermore.

For God hath made you stewards here
Upon the earth to dwell.
He that gathereth for himself,
And will not use it well,
'Gainst the kindness of his Maker
Does wickedly rebel.
And Heaven, etc.

May every blessing from on high
Attend each family dear,
Long life, health, and prosperity,
To enjoy good Christmas cheer.
Now kindly for my pretty song,
Good butler, draw some beer,
And Heaven, etc.

St. John's Day.

The moon shines bright, the stars give light.
A little before 'tis day;
And hark! the bellman of the night
Awakes us all to pray.
Awake! awake! good people all,
Awake! and you shall hear
How Christ our Lord this day was born,
To be our Saviour dear.

Arise, arise! and let us sing
Glad songs to hail the day,
The Day that Christ our Heavenly King
Did in a manger lay.
To save poor sinners such as we
From everlasting pain,
Christ died upon the cursed tree
And rose from death again.

The life of man is but a span,
He comes forth like a flower,
For presently he is cut down
And withered in an hour,
Princes and kings, with those that sing,
These ditties through the streets,
Though fortune does them here divide.
In death at last shall meet.

Holy Innocence.

Now cruel Herod, with wrath and anger filled,
Did order that all infants should be killed,
Thinking to murder our dear Saviour then,
O cruel, cruel, savage-hearted man.
Hail! ye first flowers of martyrdom,
Whom, heedless of your tender age,
Christ's persecutor, filled with rage,
Destroyed—as
Does the storm young roses in their bloom

The next carol on the sheet may be taken as a specimen of the strange doggerel of very early times:—

The Joys.

The first good joy our Mary had
It was the joy of one;
To see upon her breast
Her own beloved Son.
Her own beloved son, God-man
And blessed may He be;
Both Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
To all eternity.

The next good joy that Mary had,
It was the joy of two;
To see her own Son Jesus,
To make the lame to go,
To make the lame to go, etc.

The next good joy our Mary had,
It was the joy of three;
When that her own Son Jesus
Did make the blind to see,
To make the blind to see, etc.

The next good joy our Mary had,
It was the joy of four;
To see her own son Jesus
To read the Scriptures o'er.
To read the Scriptures o'er, etc.

The next good joy our Mary had,
It was the joy of five;
To see her own Son Jesus
To raise the dead to life.
To raise the dead to life, etc.

The next good joy that Mary had,
It was the joy of six;
To see her own Son Jesus
To wear the crucifix.
To wear the crucifix, etc.

The next good joy our Mary had,
It was the joy of seven;
To see her own son Jesus
To wear the crown of Heaven.
To wear the Crown of Heaven, etc.

The Three Ships.

As I sat on a sunny bank,
A sunny bank, a sunny bank,
As I sat on a sunny bank,
On Christmas Day in the morning.

I spy'd three ships come sailing by,
Come sailing by, come sailing by,
I spy'd three ships come sailing by,
On Christmas Day in the morning.

And who should be with these three ships,
With these three ships, these three ships,
And who should be with these three ships
But Joseph and his fair lady.

Oh, he did whistle, she did sing,
And all the bells on earth did ring,
For joy that our Saviour he was born,
On Christmas day in the morning.

Two of these carols, "The Merry Gentlemen," and the "Joys," used to be the most popular of all. A version of the latter, the fourteenth or fifteenth century, is among the Sloane MSS. in the British Museum. Another ancient carol thus begins:

"When Joseph was an old man, an old man was he,
And he married Mary, the queen of Galilee."

An old version of the hymn well known in modernized form, "Christians, awake! salute the happy morn;" "It is the day, the holy day on which our Lord was born;" "Come Christians all, behold the Lamb," and "Ye faithful, triumphant enter into Bethlehem," are carols included in most of the sheets. The latter, by the way, is invariably printed with the stop thus,

"Ye faithful triumphant,
Enter into Bethlehem," etc.

It is sung to the tune of the Portuguese Hymn. Another old favorite is "The angel Gabriel," thus commencing:

"Come, all you faithful Christians
That dwell upon the earth,
Come, celebrate the morning
That gave the Saviour birth.
This is the happy morning,
This is the happy morn,
Whereon to save our ruined race,
The Son of God was born.

"Behold the angel Gabriel,
In Scripture it is said,
Did with his holy message come
Unto the virgin maid;
Hail, blest among all women,
And thus did greet her then,
Lo, thou shalt be the mother,
Of the Saviour of all men."

Another old carol is entitled "A Virgin most pure," from the opening words:

"A virgin most pure, as the prophets did tell,
Should bring forth a son, and so it befel,
To be our Redeemer from death and from sin.
Which Adam's transgression involved us in."

Then follows the quaint chorus repeateds after each verse:

"Therefore, be merry, aye, therefore be merry,
Rejoice, and be merry, set sorrow aside,
For Christ our Redeemer was born on the tide."

Th duty of liberality to the poor at Christmastide is forcibly enjoined in the old ballad of Dives and Lazarus, beginning thus:—

"As it fell upon a day,
Dives made a feast,
And he invited all his friends,
And gentry of the best,
A Lazarus laid him down and wept,
And down at Dives' door,
Some meat, some drink, brother Dives,
Bestow upon the poor."

We conclude by quoting an equally plain and practical carol, which gives the title to one of the broadsheets.

Christmas Drawing Near At Hand.

Christmas now is drawing near at hand,
Serve the Lord and be at his command,
And God for you a portion will provide,
And give a blessing to your soul beside.

Remember, man, that thou art made of clay,
And in this world thou hast not long to stay.
This wicked world will never be content
With all its gifts that God hath sent.

Down in the garden where flowers grow in ranks,
Down on your bended knees and give the Lord thanks.
Down on your knees and pray both night and day,
Leave off your sins and live upright I pray.
So proud and lofty is some sort of sin,
Which many take delight and pleasure in.
Whose conversation God doth much dislike,
And yet he shakes his head before he strikes.
So proud and lofty do some people go,
Dressing themselves like players in a show.
They patch and paint and dress with idle stuff,
As if God had not made them fine enough.
E'en little children learn to curse and swear.
And can't rehearse one word of godly prayer,
Oh! teach them better—teach them to rely
On Christ the sinner's friend who reigns on high.

In the older carols which we have quoted will be noticed some fragments of ancient superstition and error, for they date from pre-Reformation times. On the whole it is satisfactory to state that the teaching of the carols is sound, and that the offences are mainly against propriety and good taste. Without losing what has hold on the popular mind, it would be easy to produce broadsheets more attractive in appearance, and with greater variety of matter.

A Patagonian Rum Dance.

Some of the older men gathered around the cask, which was speedily tapped, and then, with great unction and solemnity they proceeded to taste the liquor in order to see if it had been over watered. Several decided grunts of satisfaction, however, showed that these aged fathers approved of its strength, whereupon a general and doubtless equitable distribution of the spirit took place, and before long the whole camp, men, women, and children, had ample opportunities for judging of its merits for themselves.

Presently a dance was organized. The men who took part in it were all specially painted for the occasion, and wore long feathers on their heads. The dance itself was a monotonous jig, executed to the excruriating music of various drums or tom-toms. The women, strange to say, do not dance; at least they did not as long as they were sober.

As the evening wore on, after vast quantities of meat had been consumed and innumerable dances had been performed, special attention began to be paid to the aguardiente, and the fun consequently soon began to be very fast and very furious.—[Wanderings in Patagonia.

Prognostications.

The most common prognostications of death in Sicily are: the midnight howling of a dog: the hooting of an owl: the crowing of a hen at night: to dream of dead friends or kinsfolk: to sweep the house at night: or to make a new opening of any kind in an inhabited house. Boys are of evil omen when they accompany the Viaticum, but as they always do accompany it, it would seem as if no one who has received the Last Sacraments has a chance of recovery. He has not much; but it does at times happen that he breaks the bonds of death already woven round him and comes out with renewed life and vigor. Death is expected at midnight or at the first hours of the morning or at midday. If delayed, something supernatural is expected. Had the dying man when in health burned the yoke of a plow? Is there an unwashed linen thread in his mattress? Perhaps he once, like care, killed a cat. If he delays his dying, the friends must call out his name in seven Litanies, or at least put his clothes out of doors. In any case he dies because the doctor has misunderstood his case and given him a wrong medicine; else Saints Cosmo and Damian Saints Francisco and Paolo, would have saved him. When he dies the women raise the death-howl and let loose their hair about their shoulders. All his good qualities are enumerated and his bad ones are forgotten. He is dressed in white, and after he is dead his shroud is sewed tight. This pious work gains indulgences for those who perform it; and the very needle is preserved as a sacred possession. Sometimes, however, it is left in the grave-clothes to be buried with the corpse. In certain places the women are buried in their wedding dress, which they have kept all these years to serve as their shroud. Seated or in bed, the corpse is always laid out feet foremost to the door, and for this reason no one in Sicily makes a bed with the head to the window and feet to the door. It would be a bad omen. About the corpse bed stand lighted candles, or, however poor the family, at least one little oil lamp. The hired mourners, "repulatrici," were once so numerous and costly as to demand legislative interference and municipal regulation. To this day they tear their hair and throw it in handsful on the corpse, and the sisters who lament their brothers—rustic Antigones and Electras—exhale their sorrows in sweet and mournful songs.—Temple Bar.

The Maelstrom.

On the 10th July, 1856, I was sailing very near to the spot where the Maelstrom is marked on our English maps, and therefore looked for it on the detailed sailing charts and other Norwegian maps that were on board. It was not to be found on any of them. I then asked the Captain as to its whereabouts, he having had much experience in these parts. He told me that the only information he had ever been able to obtain concerning it had been obtained from English geography books and the accounts of English passengers; that the fishermen who lived on the islands on each side of it knew nothing at all about it in consequence of their ignorance of the English language. He was cruelly satirical. There is a current between Lofotoden and Mosken (the position usually assigned to the fabulous vortex) known as Moskostrommen, one of the many tidal currents that run through the sounds between the multitude of islands constituting the Lofoden Archipelago. At the spring tides, when heavy gales are blowing from east or west, the Moskostrom is sufficiently dangerous to be avoided by prudent navigators, but in fair and calm weather is no more dangerous than that between the arches of Putney bridge. As Tonsberg says the "Norge" (the national illustrated handbook of Norway,) the fishermen dwelling on the spot have no fear of the Strom, they fish in it and suffer their boats to drift on its surface." For reasons that I have explained this current may have been more rapid in former times than now, but it was never anything but a simple tide stream running through a channel.—[The Gentleman's Magazine.

Pliny's Wife.

What a delightful picture has the younger Pliny given posterity in his letters! Of Calphurnia, his wife, he says: "Her affection to me has given her a turn for books; and my compositions, which she takes a pleasure in reading, and even getting by heart, are continually in her hands. How full of tender solicitude is she when I am entering upon any cause! How kindly does she rejoice with me when it is over! While I am pleading, she places persons to inform her from time to time what success attends the cause. When at any time I recite my works, she conceals herself behind some curtain, and with secret rapture enjoys my praises. She sings my verses to her lyre, with no other master but love—the best instructor—for her guide. Her passion will increase with our days, for it is not my youth, nor person; which time gradually impairs, but my reputation of which she is enamoured.

Blue Stocking.

The origin of this name is traced to the literary society, composed of both sexes, and formed at Venice in the year 1400. Having existed up to the year 1590, it cropped up in Paris, and was especially patronized by lady savantes. The original societies distinguished their members by the wearing of blue stockings, which livery or badge was kept up on the birth of the branch in France, and afterward in England, where it was started by Mrs. Montague in 1780. Miss Monckton, afterwards Countess of Cork, was the last survivor of the clique; she died in 1840, and the Blue Stocking Society became extinct.

VARIETIES.

There is now no established religion in Japan, and missionaries are regarded as harmless curiosities.

At the Poultry Show recently held at Amsterdam concurrently with the Agricultural exhibition one of the female birds in a pen of Toulouse geese sent from England weighed thirty-four pounds.

The Church of the Holy Ghost at Heidelberg is divided by a partition running lengthwise through it. On the one side the service is Protestant and on the other Roman Catholic. The Elector Palatine in 1719, undertook to annex the Protestant part of the church; but the attempt was a failure.

Some interesting particulars have been given before the Social Science Congress concerning the extent to which excessive railway-rates are driving business from the Midlands to the ports. No fewer than six important firms are said to be removing their manufacturies from Birmingham to the sea-coast.

The oldest and largest tree in the world, so far as known, is a chestnut at the foot of Mount Etna. It it hollow and large enough to admit two carriages driving abreast through it. The circumference of the main trunk is two hundred and twelve feet. The American Grizzly Giant, monarch of the Mariposa Grove, measures ninety-two feet.

The Yangste-Kiang, or Blue River, of China, usually called the Ta-kiang, or Great River, rises in the high central plateau of Tibet. It extends from 88° E to 122° E., covering it its winding course a distance of some three thousand miles, of which two thousand miles are navigable. The main stream is formed by three branches having their confluence in 94° E., 34° 50' N., where its breadth in the dry weather is seven hundred and fifty feet, and in the summer rains over a mile. Its level here is thirteen thousand feet above the sea.

New Zealand Mutton. — London takes an immense quantity of New Zealand mutton, and it is largely supplied even by the West-end butchers, without the knowledge of their customers. The quality is excellent. The freezing arrangements are so far perfected that the London butcher can send to the large cold store rooms at the docks for as many carcases as he requires, with the certainty of being able in a couple of hours to furnish his customers with joints which they will be unable to distinguish from home-fed mutton. Buying these at fivepence per pound and retailing them at elevenpence, his motives for preferring them to animals bought at Islington at even sevenpence per pound are sufficiently obvious.

Intermarriage of Cousins. — The prevalent idea that the offspring of the intermarriage of first cousins are specially liable to be below the average intellectually and physically is not found to be sustained by good evidence. Mr. G. H. Darwin, in a very carefully prepared paper, read before the Statistical Society, comes to the conclusion, as the result of close comparison of all the records available, that evidence will not "enable anyone to say positively that the marriage of first cousins has any effort in the production of insanity or idiocy. . . . With respect to deaf mutes, there is no evidence whatever of any ill results accruing to the offspring in consequence of the cousinship of their parents." And again, "It tends to invalidate the high death-rate among the offspring of cousins." And once more, "the safeat verdict seems to be that the charge against consanguineous marriages on this head is not proven."

Fighting Sleep With Tea.

The practice of taking tea or coffee by students, in order to work at night; is downright madness, especially when preparing for an examination. More than half of the cases of break-down, loss of memory, fainting, etc, which occur during severe examinations, and far more frequently than is commonly known, is due to this.

I frequently hear of promising students who have thus failed; and, on inquiry, have learned—in almost every instance—that the victim had previously drugged himself with tea or coffee. Sleep is the rest of the brain; to rob the hard-worked brain of its necesary rest is cerebral suicide.

My old friend, the late Thomas Wright was a victim of this terrible folly. He undertook the translation of the life of Julius Cæsar," by Napoleon III., and to do it in a cruelly short time. He fulfilled his contract by sitting up several nights successively by the aid of strong tea or coffee (I forget which). I saw him shortly afterward. In a few weeks he had aged alarmingly, and became quite bald, his brain gave way and he never recovered. There was but little difference between his age and mine, and but for this dreadful cerebral strain, rendered possible only by the alkaloid (for otherwise he would have fallen asleep over his work, and thereby saved his life), he might still be amusing and instructing thousands of readers by fresh volumes.

Cremation in Scandinavia.

Cremation is making way even in Scandinavia. The Swedes have long favored cremation, but hitherto their efforts to obtain from their authorities the sanction for building a crematorium at Stockholm have been unsuccessful. At the last meeting of the Swedish Cremation Society, however, the President, Lieut.-Gen. Klingenstierna, announced that arrangements had been made with the Stockholm authorities for erecting a crematorium in one of the suburbs. The place chosen is a high rocky plain to the north of the city, where a wide view is obtained of the surroundings. A large plot of ground round the crematorium is to be laid out as a public park at the expense of the town. It is hardly likely to be a popular promenade when a cremation is progress.

MARKDALE DEC. 18, 1884.

MUNICIPAL.

The municipal elections are drawing near, and it becomes every ratepayer to consider the situation.

In Glenelg, the largest and most wealthy and influential ward, in the township is without a representative. This is not as it should be, and we suggest that a meeting be called in order to select a candidate for the coming contest. Markdale is paying a very important share of the township rates and is entitled to at least one representative, and it is our own fault if we are without one. Monday the 29th will be nomination day, and something should be done before that time.

DECIDED TO BUILD.

An adjourned meeting was held in the Methodist church here last Friday evening to further consider the advisability of erecting a new church the coming year. There was a large attendance, the country being especially well represented. The question was thoroughly discussed, during which time a most harmonious feeling existed. Resolution was unanimously passed in favor of building the coming summer on conditions that the sum of $8,000 be first subscribed. This condition is not considered an obstacle, as that amount will readily be subscribed, two thirds being already promised, without going out of this village.

Midnight Mechanics.

On Friday night, about half past twelve Mr. John Hill, painter, who resides in Dr. Sproule's block, over Benson's grocery and liquor store, was awakened by what he supposed to be breaking of a window in the shop below, he listened until he was sure that some one was making a raid, when he jumped up, dressed, and thinking he would go lighter and make less noise, he pulled on two pair of socks and left his boots behind. He first went and aroused Benson, who lives a block distant from the grocery, and then returned to watch proceedings while Benson got dressed, but before the latter arrived the burglar made his exit from the unexpected part of the store, when Hill gave chace pursuing the thief around Hill Bro's corner and up Sydenham street to the street leading to the agricultural ground, when the latter scaled the high fence and escaped. In returning Hill found a pair of boots, the thief having dropped his boots which he had in his hand. he also lost one sock, which Hill found on his return trip. On examination the next morning it was found that entrance was made to the cellar by a side window, but nothing of importance was missing. The burglar was evidently either hungry and dry, and simply desired a feed, or else being disturbed in his plunder made a hasty retreat without accomplishing his purpose. A strong suspicion rests upon a Markdale citizen.

Correspondence.

NOTICE.—We wish it distinctly understood that we do not hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed by our correspondents.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—The forcible entry with burglarious intent which some scoundrel effected last week into Benson's establishment brings prominently before us the question of "Night protection." How are we to guard our premises against thieves and midnight prowlers, whose footsteps are ever shrouded in darkness? This is the question of the hour which just now prominently claims the attention of our merchants and others who wish to guard their premises against such intrusions.

To all those who are anxious to procure the most absolute protection the writer is pleased to announce that for the small sum of $50 he will make known a plan for setting an automatic "Spring Gun," or a self acting "Torpedo Flash" which will effectually dispose of all intruders in such a way that more than the "Boots" will remain to discover the culprit. It cannot be too widely known, that there are other means of guarding our premises than by the faithful "watchdog" or the expensive "policeman" both of which experience has taught us may be tampered with.

Was It Dynamite.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—A serious occurrence, and what might have turned out to be more serious still, took place on my premises and in my presence some time ago. The matter was kept from the public, as the young man, who was the victim, was seeking an helpmeet, and did not wish that others would have too much fun at his expense. It occurred as follows:

At a certain time, and in a certain place, I wanted to divide my flock of sheep. In order to carry out my wishes I appointed three young men to attend to the matter. A few of the sheep were in the yard, the gentleman of the flock being one of the number, but the greater part were in the stable. One of the young men was placed in side to catch the sheep; another outside to keep those that were out a proper distance from the door; the third, an injured one, was placed at the door, which was about four feet high, to guard both sides. The door being low he had to stand in a stooping attitude. All being ready, the inside party commenced to catch the sheep, which became very much excited, running first one way then another, some rapidly running for the door, the guard always managing to turn them. The noise made by them created an excitement among the flock outside. Finally a large ewe made for the door, determined to be out guard or no guard. Summoning all the fortitude he possessed (which was no little) the guard endeavored to stop her, but to no avail, on she came striking him first on the forehead. The gentleman sheep wishing to get in, was at the same instant, coming up behind, with all the force of a steam engine struck the guard behind with such force and in such a fashion, that up he went as though blown from the earth by some volcanic agency We watched for him, he came down, and great was the fall; but, oh! the looks clearly proving the effect the atmosphere has on a person when raised a distance from the earth. Every drop of blood in his body seemed to have flown to his head, his eyes protruding from their sockets, leading the spectators to fear they would fall out of the place assigned them by nature, after which he began to change and the change struck terror to the hearts of all around him. He seemed determined to have revenge; sometimes he would run at the sheep; other times he would make for the young men (who had been assisting him), but they managed to keep out of his way. After a time he began to come to his senses, and sitting down on the straw, he placed his hand on his head, wished in his inmost soul that he had never been born into this world of trials and tribulations.

We are pleased to say that, all things considered, he is recovering. Out of regard for the young man's feelings we forbear giving the name.

MEAFORD ROAD CORRESPONDENT No. 8.

To the Editor of the Standard.

DEAR SIR,—With your permission I crave the privilege of saying a few words in reference to an article which appeared a few weeks ago in the STANDARD reflecting upon the Canada Presbyterian and calculated to lower that journal in the estimation of those for whom it is intended. To that article I would gladly have replied at an earlier date but waited expecting that an abler pen than mine would have been employed in the genial task. Apparently I have waited in vain, hence now even at the eleventh hour lest it should be thought that there is not sufficient loyalty among the Presbyterians of Markdale to the old "Blue Banner" or a sufficiently intelligent regard for the reputation and welfare of the only "Organ" of our church in the province to resent the insult, I am constrained to enter my feeble protest.

I have been a reader of the Presbyterian for many years and I have always regarded it as a well conducted journal whose editorial and selected matter, with few exceptions, bore traces of comprehensive scholarship, cultured learning and a depth of research which would do credit to the best of metropolitan publications: and though I am not disposed to set much store by my own opinions in this respect yet I am happy to find that this opinion is strengthened and confirmed by that of many other better able to judge as the following extracts which appeared in last weeks Truth will show.

"The Canada Presbyterian shows in "the front rank of denominational "journals on this continent.—Thorold "Post."

"A most able representative of the "press and of the church for which it "speaks; evidently bound to keep up with all the requirements of our rather exacting time.—Toronto World."

"Its columns are thronged with "strong and editorial articles and paragraphs, news of the churches and "general selections, together with a "valuable advertising patronage.—"Toronto Globe."

"It will now compare favorably with "any of the New York religious weeklies.—Port Hope Guide."

"It is conducted with marked ability "and filled from week to week with "matter that should be in the family "of every Presbyterian.—Berlin Telegraph."

"The general editorial matter shows "a breadth and liberality of view that "renders the paper welcome in any "household.—London Advertiser."

Besides the foregoing, the names of a few of its stated contributors are a sufficient guarantee that the Canada Presbyterian will continue in the future as in the past to reflect the noblest sentiments of the church and the purest morality of the age.

Rev. Principal McKnight, D. D.; Rev. Prof. Forrest, M. A.; Rev. G. D. Mathews, D. D.; Rev. R. Campbell, M. A.; Rev. John Lang, D. D; Rev. R. R. Burns, D. D.; Principal McVicar, L. L. D.; Rev. W. Cochrane, D. D; Principal King, D. D.; Sir Wm. Dawson, L. L. D. Magill University and many others who are as household words in many Presbyterian families throughout the land.

I cannot imagine, Sir, why any Presbyterian should have written in the strain of the article referred to unless from interested motives of a very low order, and yet it is hardly likely that any one of another communion would have ventured unsolicited to proffer his council in a matter wherein he was not concerned.

Thanking you Mr. Editor, for this privilege I will close for the present.

Markdale, Dec. 16 '84.

Flesherton.

From our own correspondent.

The entertainment under the auspices of the Sons of Temperance held in the Town Hall last Thursday evening was in every respect a decided success. The lengthy and interesting program was carried out to perfection. Mr. Galbraith of Toronto was present and added much to the program. Dr. Christoe occupied the chair in a most pleasing and graceful manner.

Going West.—Mrs. W. G. Duncan and family, Miss Duncan and John Sample & wife started from Flesherton station Tuesday morning for the Western States there to join Mr. W. G. Duncan who has been there for some months.

The above came too late for last week.

The Ball family Jubilee Singers gave a concert in the Town Hall last Thursday under the auspices of the Royal Templars of Temperance here. There was full house and the audience seemed to enjoy the songs from the colored singers. A large number were present from Markdale. A very friendly feeling exists between this and the sister society in that village.

Last week Mr. McMillan of Meaford held a public Scott Act meeting in this village in the Town Hall which was very well attended. Mr. McMillan gave a very interesting address which was listened to with wrapt attention, after which a central committee for this township was formed in order to carry the campaign in this township to a successful issue. Mr. Fawcett, Editor of the Advance, occupied the chair. His words were few but well chosen.

MISTAKES.—On Thursday last we had occasion to meet the evening train going South at Flesherton Station. When the train arrived we noticed, with others, a family of strangers come from the train; they first enquired for a bus driver, and desired him to drive them to Mr. Fawcett's; It occurred to us at the time that it was some of Mr. F's relations coming to visit him, and we were strengthened in our surmises by their complexion, but were both astonished and amused to learn later, that they were the Ball family of jubilee singers.

Accident.—Mr. Wm. The editor of the Advance is very ready to take exchanges to task for presuming to clip from his paper without giving credit. It's a poor rule won't work both ways. Wonder where he got his report of the recent Conservative convention held in Markdale. For our part, we do not always give credit for scissorisms, but we don't grumble if others do likewise, but we don't like to see a person finding fault with others for a thing he practices himself.

Santa Claus.

Chirrup! Chirrup! Christmas Cricket
Ch'rrup! all the evening through!
For a footstep's at the wicket,
And the wind is in the flue.

Chirrup! Chirrup!—He is rap'ring:
Chirrup!—There! Undo the door;
Santa Claus, Sir, from his tapping;
He's been often here of yore

Chirrup! B'ess hi!—Old and jolly
(Just as when I was a boy),
With a little Christmas holly,
And a deal of Christmas joy

With a bundle white and snowy,
And his boots a trifle damp,
And his eyes—the night is blowy—
Look rheumy near the lamp.

But the same old, honest laughter,
And the same old cheery tone,
With a chord of sorrow after,
And a tenderness its own.

And he takes the chair we offer
In the chimney corner here,
And he dirks the glass I proffer,
As we talk of Christmas cheer.

Just the same old, hearty fellow
With his presents for the boys,
With his winter apples mellow,
And his store of children's toys;

With his crackers and his kisses,
And his rebuses and rhymes,
And his mistletoe for Misses,
And his tales of olden times.

Just the same, and little older,
With the good things in his pack,
With the white locks on his shoulder,
And the snowflakes on his back.

Bless him! Chirrup! Christmas Cricket!
Chirrup! all the evening through!
For his footsteps at the wicket,
And the wind is in the flue;

And the wintry gusts distress him,
And the way is wild and long,
And the little children bless him
For their stories and their song!

WILLIAM TWAMLEY.

Christmas Folk-Tales.

Scattered round the Christmas season, we find in our own and other countries a host of amusing old folk-tales, most of which, apart from their own instrinsic interest, are valuable as faithfully embodying the superstitious beliefs of our forefathers in connection with the Yuletide festival. It would seem that, in days gone by, these fireside legends were extensively circulated at Christmas-tide; the varied incidents they contained acting as so many warnings to those who might, inadvertently or otherwise, be induced to disregard the traditionary notions of the season. As the greater part of these tales are novel probably to most readers, it may not be inopportune to give some illustrations of them. Thus Norwegian folk-tales often allude to the merry doings of the "Nisse" at Christmas time—a class of fairies about the size of small children, and who were, we are reminded, far more numerous in the good old times than nowadays. Like Shakspeare's Puck, they are fond of pranks, and unless the master of the house pampers them they are spiteful and vindictive, and hence it is not surprising that their goodwill is deemed worth securing On Christmas Eve, therefore, offerings of sweet porridge, cakes, beer, and other delicacies are provided specially for them; but care must be taken that this act is performed with every mark of respect, otherwise they will quickly show their displeasure. Thus, it is related how, one Christmas Eve, when a girl in a mocking spirit brought these little beings their customary offerings, she was so severely handled by them that on the following Christmas morning she was found dead in the barn. With tales of this kind told among the peasantry, and received by them with the utmost faith, we can well imagine how ready they naturally were to gain the patronage and friendship of these mysterious elves who, in a thousand and one ways, could befriend those who acknowledged their superior power. Among Norwegian folk-tales of the sea relating to Christmas, we are told how a certain sailor, according to custom, was desirous of presenting on Christmas Day a cake to the spirit of the waters; but when he came to the shore, lo!—much to his disappointment—the waters were frozen over. Reluctant to leave his offering upon the ice, he tried to make a hole; but, in spite of all his labors, he could not make it large enough for the cake to go through. When perplexed as to what he should do, he was agreeably surprised by the appearance of a little tiny hand, as white as snow, which, stretching through the hole he had made, seized the cake and instantly disappeared with it. In this legend originates, it is said, the compliment paid to a Norwegian lady, "Your hand is like a water sprite's."

The Norse peasant, in his popular tales, has a curious solution for the oft-asked question, "Why the sea is salt?" It appears, says Mr. Dasent, that once upon a time, long long ago, there were two brothers, one rich and the other poor. Now it happened on Christmas Eve that the poor one had not so much as a crumb of bread to eat, so he went to his brother for help, who gave him a whole flitch of bacon, at the same time bidding him go to a certain evil magician. On arriving at the magician's house, he was surrounded by a host of persons anxious to buy his flitch. "Well," said he, "by rights my old dame and I ought to have this flitch for our Christmas dinner, but since you have all set your hearts on it, I suppose you must have it; but if I sell it at all, I must have in return that quern behind the door yonder." At first, the old magician laughed outright at this proposal, but the "poor brother" stuck to it, and so at last the magician parted with his quern. On reaching home, the clock struck twelve, as his wife met him at the door, wondering what had kept him so long. "Oh!" said he, "you shall quickly see the cause of my delay;" after which words, he laid the quern on the table, bidding it grind everything necessary for the Christmas fare. The wife, as may be imagined, stood thunderstruck, watching this quern grind out dainties enough to last till Twelfth Day. When, however, the rich brother on Christmas Day saw all that was on the table, he was very envious, and said, "Whence have you got all this wealth?" For some time the poor brother refused to tell; but in the course of the day's rejoicings he incautiously gave the history of the magic quern, which his brother ultimately bought for three hundred dollars. Before long, however, he found that it kept on grinding; and so alarmed was he that he resold it to his brother for the same money as he had purchased it. As before, it soon brought renewed prosperity to the poor brother, which enabled him to buy a golden house, the fame whereof spread far and wide, and attracted strangers from all parts. So, one day, a stranger came to see the quern, and the first question he asked was whether it could grind salt. "Grind salt?" said the owner, "I should just think so; and anything else you like." Thereupon, so anxious was he to buy the quern that he promised to pay untold wealth for it. Secured of his prize, he put to sea, and when so far off that no one could reach him, he said to the quern "Grind salt; and grind both fast and good." No sooner had he spoken than the quern forthwith began grinding salt, which, in an amazing short time, arose in heaps on the deck and threatened to sink his vessel. Alarmed at the rapidity with which the quern kept grinding, he intreated it on his knees to leave off; but still it went on, and before many minutes the vessel sank beneath the weight of salt. But the quern, still beneath the water, keeps grinding, and hence the saltness of the sea

We may add that these tales, in which the witch element figures strongly, still exist in our own country. Thus, in the Isle of Man, it is related how a fiddler, having agreed with a stranger to play during the twelve days of Christmas to whatever company he should bring him, was astonished at seeing his new master vanish into the earth as soon as the bargain had been made. Terrified at the thought of having agreed to work for so mysterious a personage, he quickly resorted to the clergyman, who advised him to fulfil his engagement, and to play nothing but psalms. Accordingly, as soon as Christmas tide arrived, the weird stranger made his appearance, and beckoned the fiddler to a spot where the company were assembled. On reaching his destination he at once struck up a psalm tune, which so enraged his audience that they instantly vanished, but not without so violently bruising him that it was with some difficulty he succeeded in reaching home, and narrating his Christmas experience to the family as they were gathered round the fireside.

In Germany, Christmas Eve is the season of all others when fairies are supposed to be most active, keeping their festival on the mountain tops. Then, we are told, the rough stone is transformed into brilliant crystal—veins of gold starting out artistically into majestic pillars—beneath which graceful canopy feasting and dancing are kept up with protracted enthusiasm. The attendants on these fairy-gatherings are generally beautiful Swedish girls, who have unwarily partaken of the contents of the golden goblets offered to them by the fairies, and thus instantly fallen into their power. According to the legendary lore found in most parts of Germany, the magic effects of these fairy potions is threefold:—"At the first draught from that horn, he who drinks forgets Heaven; at the second, he forgets earth; at the third, he forgets his betrothed bride." Hence, on Christmas Eve persons are recommended to stay at home, because the fairies on this night delight to waylay the lonely traveller, compelling him to take a draught of Christmas cheer from their enchanted goblet. Among the large class of folk-tales connected with this superstition, may be quoted one which tells how, when a Christmas feast was being given in a German village, one of the guests, attracted by the sound of music from without, was induced to leave the festive scene indoors, and to wander towards the spot where the music seemed to come. He had, however, not gone many steps before he was met by two beautiful girls, who asked him to join their Christmas gambols in a neighboring field, which, after a little persuasion, he consented to do. On arriving at the fairies' gathering, for such it was, he was surrounded by numberless little beings all anxious to welcome him; one of whom handed him a cup of wine, after drinking which he forgot his former state, and thought of nothing except the feasting and dancing of the fairies. When he had been enjoying himself in this manner for some time, the fairies reminded him of his own home; but what was his astonishment when on passing through the village to find everything in decay, and all his relations and friends dead, for the spell of the fairies' cup on him had lasted a hundred years.

One German version of the well-known legend of the man in the moon connects this wretched individual's solitary imprisonment in that isolated region with his having stolen cabbages from his neighbor's garden on Christmas Eve. When just in the act of escaping with his load he was perceived by some passers by, who, there and then, conjured him up in the moon. There he stands in the full light of the moon, to be seen by everybody, having his stolen load of cabbages on his back for all eternity. He only has a minute's change one day in the year, when he is said to turn around once on Christmas Eve.

Again, the wild huntsman is said in Germany to make nightly excursions through the air for the twelve nights of Christmas, alarming all who hear him by his furious progress. He generally rides upon a large white horse, no less than four-and-twenty fierce dogs following him. According to a tale quoted by Mr. Thorpe, in his "Northern Mythology," in every place through which he passes the hedges fall with a crash, the road opening of its own accord before him. He rides with such speed that his dogs often fail to keep apace with him; and frequently may be heard panting and howling. Occasionally one is left behind, as happened one year at Wulfadorf, where it remained panting, howling without intermission until the following Christmas Eve, when the Wild Huntsman again took it with him. Hence various precautions were formerly taken to prevent the Wild Huntsman approaching any particular street—one special rule being that there should be no baking.

It is also considered dangerous to spin at Christmas-time, or the Wild Huntsman will gallop through it. On one occasion a woman refused to take the usual warning, and had no sooner sat down to spin on Christmas Eve than she fell into a deep sleep, and was only awoke by the entrance of a stranger, who, without any apology for intruding, asked for her spinning-wheel, and commenced spinning. Before long he used up all the flax she had, and on his asking for more, she was obliged to give him her supply of wool. Still, however, he kept on calling for more; and his angry demands so frightened and terrified the poor woman that, although it was but four in the morning, she roused up her neighbor—a cunning old crone—and acquainted her with the stranger's mysterious conquest. Happily, she quickly perceived the nature of the visitor, and hence was not long in driving him away by some magical charms; for had she not done so, his presence might have cost the woman her life.

Of the numerous folk-tales which have in the course of centuries clustered round the Christmas festival in Russia, one of the most popular refers to the celebration of the winter solstice. Thus it is said that the Sun—a female being—arrays herself in her holiday attire, and, seated in her telega, urges her horses upon the summer track. In many places, says Mr. Ralston, in his "Songs of the Russian People" (1872, p 187), it has been customary to represent this solar goddess—popularly designated Kolyada—by a girl dressed in white, who, seated in a sledge, is driven about from house to house, while the young people who accompany her sing various songs, of which the following is a specimen:—

Kolyada! Kolyada!
Kolyada has arrived
On the Eve of the Nativity.
We went about, we sought
Holy Kolyada
Through all the courts, in all the alleys,
We found Kolyada, &c.
Kerr

Tradition, too, says that at this season of the year all kinds of hidden treasures are specially revealed to mankind, in connection with which belief the following tale, quoted by Mr. Ralston, is current:—Between Christmas Day and the festival of the Epiphany the new-born Divinity comes down from heaven in order to wander about the earth; on which account labor of any kind is accounted wrong. At midnight, also, on each of these festivals, "the heavenly doors are thrown open; the radiant realms of Paradise in which the sun dwells disclose their treasures; the waters of springs and rivers become animated, turn into wine, and receive a healing efficacy; the trees put forth blossoms, and golden fruits ripen upon their boughs."

Space will not permit us to multiply further instances of these Christmas tales, but the few we have quoted will suffice to show their general nature.

RAILWAYS IN CHINA.

In a country where time is no object, where punctuality is unknown, and where haste is regarded as a sign of ill-breeding, the introduction of railways seems a superfluous anomaly. And yet stress of circumstances has so forced the hands of the statesmen of China that an imperial decree has, we are told, been issued inviting proposals for the construction of railways through the northern part of the empire. Thus the day has arrived which has for years been looked forward to by financial syndicates, groups of contractors, and ambitious foreign engineers. Already, no doubt, plans and maps which have been kept carefully pigeon-holed at Shanghai and Hong-Kong in preparation for the turn which events are now taking are on their way to Prince Kung's successor at Peking, and to his omnipotent lieutenant, Li Hung Chang, whose only difficulty will be to make choice of the best among the many schemes which will be laid before them. It is, however, by no means certain that foreigners, or at all events any subjects of the Great Powers, will have much to do with the construction of the proposed lines. The Chinese have shown of late a natural desire to do their own work, or if foreign help has to be called in, to employ people of nationalities whose desire to encroach may reasonably be considered as limited by their lack of power to trespass. Thus to Danes have fallen much of the work connected with laying the new telegraph lines, which, from a Chinese point of view, could not safely be entrusted to subjects of states possessing large armies and powerful fleets.

On the subject of the adoption of railways the Chinese have hitherto proved themselves stolidly indifferent to the promptings of active plenipotentiaries and of interested advisers. For some years it has been foreseen by the most enlightened of their statesmen that railways are inevitable, but at the same time they have wisely determined to wait for the demand of a naturally developed want, and have set their faces steadily against pandering either to a gushing philanthropy or to the outcry begotten of a manufactured need. In this spirit they refused on behalf of the late Emperor, the present of a railway which a number of well-meaning English capitalists proposed to lay down in the palace grounds for the amusement of his Imperial Majesty; and they pulled up the Woo-Sung Railway, which, having been made for the purpose of stimulating the appetite of the people for railways, enjoyed a checkered course of popularity, litigation, and financial loss for just six weeks. As though destined to be the unfortunate plaything of people in advance of the age, the materiel of this railway was shipped to Formosa by an enthusiastic mandarin who thought it possible to regenerate the island by carrying passengers and goods about it at the rate of thirty miles an hour. He even succeeded in collecting several hundred thousand dollars to make his road, but before he could begin the work he was transferred to another scene of usefulness, and the mandarin who entered on his labors entered also into the possession of his accumulated dollars. From that day to this nothing has been heard of the funds and the rails and rolling-stock are at this moment resting on the Formosan wharves.

But during the eight years which have elapsed since the Woo-Sung fiasco events have occurred which have educated the native mind at an unprecedented rate. One of the most awful famines which have ever visited any country has desolated whole provinces of the empire; there have been in the outlying dependencies rumours of wars with Russia and Japan, and actual crossing of swords with France. The telegraphs also, which now carry messages from Pekin to Canton in a few minutes, have aggravated the growing impatience at the slowness of the means of transport from one place to another, and the natural result of these conditions is the now expressed desire to have the iron horse running through the land.

Private interests are also in favor of the innovation, and Prince Ch'un, the Emperor's father, who, according to the quidnuncs of Shanghai, is opposed to everything foreign, has inaugurated his accession to power by giving his cordial support to the new proposal, and has sanctioned an order for a quantity of steel rails from the Osnabruck steel-works. For the last two or three years the Prince has taken an active interest in the coal and iron mines of the northern provinces and he probably recognizes the fact that his profits might be increased a hundredfold if the output were carried to market in railway trucks rather than in donkey carts. It is doubtless in connection with these mines that the first railway will be constructed, and fortunately for the undertaking the prospects of an immediate return are unquestionably certain. In Shan-see, the province adjoining the metropolitan province on the west, the extent of the coal field is incalculably great, while in the immediate neighborhood iron abounds in profusion.

In estimating the effects which are likely to be produced on the country by railways, it is necessary to consider the social side of the question. Although caste in its technical sense is unknown in China, the divisions which separate the ranks of the mandarins are as marked as those which divide the different Brahminical grades, and the gulf which intervenes between the official classes and the people is quite as wide as that which yawns between the Brahmin and Shudra classes. And in one sense the Chinese distinctions are more difficult to deal with than the Indian, in that they affect every act in the daily intercourse of life. At first, therefore, the levelling tendency of railways will beyond question produce some searchings of heart among the privileged classes. A red-buttoned mandarin whirling through the country in company with a parcel of rich shopkeepers would be in a position as distasteful to himself as embarrassing to his fellow-travellers, whose only attitude in the presence of so great a man would at any other time be one of humble prostration.

The necessity for punctuality also will be galling to men who have always been accustomed to start on their journeys at any hour they please, unfettered by time or time-tables; and the idea of a railway guard starting a train without waiting for a leisurely approaching local magnate would be an unheard-of want of propriety. Even in the time-tables plain to the people, some preliminary difficulties will unquestionably arise. The day of twenty-four hours is, according to Chinese reckoning, divided into twelve equal divisions, which are known as the period of the rat, the ox, the tiger, the hare, the dragon, the serpent, the horse, the sheep, the monkey, the cock, the dog, and the boar. Each of these periods is subdivided into eight parts of fifteen minutes each, and these are the smallest divisions of time known to all except the few fortunate possessors of watches. This at once opens a field for the wildest confusion and strange misunderstandings. What will minute, represent to the minds of people accustomed only to reckon by the rat, the ox, the tiger, etc.? and how will the fine distinctions of A.M. and P.M. be brought home to their intelligence? Though these and all other difficulties, not the least of which will be connected with ladies travelling, will disappear with time, they will not be less real while they last: and though railways will ultimately lead up to greater reforms and will produce greater advantages in China than in any empire under the sun, they will probably have to encounter a period of probation which will try the patience and tax the resources of the promoters and supporters of their existence.

Three cases are reported to the French Association for the Advancement of the Sciences of immediate cure of paralysis aglians by means of hypnotic suggestion. The patients had become unable to write legibly, but when the affirmation was made to them emphatically during sleep that they could write as well as other people, they did so forthwith and retained the power after awaking. M. Liebault showed specimens of the handwriting as produced before, during, and after the hypnotic sleep, and said he had obtained like results during several years of practice.

DR. MAXWELL'S AWFUL CRIME.

He Forces His Four Children to Swallow Poison and Three of Them Die.

A terrible tragedy was enacted at Springfield, O., recently, resulting in the death of the three children of Dr. John Maxwell. About six o'clock the doctor sent his wife to a store on an errand which would detain her some time, leaving him alone with his children, ranging in age from 4 to 15. As soon as his wife had gone he called his children into a room, and, threatening to kill them in case of a refusal, induced them to swallow a mixture of aconite and chloroform. Then he tied a cloth saturated with the same drug around the mouth and nostrils of each, and laid his victims on a bed. The children, after struggling for a few minutes, sank into insensibility. Maxwell then administered a dose to himself and lay down on the bed beside his unconscious children. In a few minutes after the doctor had swallowed the poison, Mrs Maxwell came home. Upon seeing the insensible forms of her children on the bed she suspected the terrible truth, and at once summoned assistance. Medical aid was speedily at hand, but before the physicians arrived Blanche, aged 12, was dead, Arthur, the youngest child, died shortly after 1 o'clock next morning, and Kenneth aged 10, died at 4 o'clock next morning. Grace, the eldest child, is still alive, but the prospects of her ultimate recovery are considered remote. The father recovered during the night, and in the morning was placed in jail. Mrs. Maxwell is in a terrible condition, and it is feared the shock will deprive her of reason. Dr. Maxwell had written a letter saying he was tired of life, and as he did not wish to leave his children to a life of poverty, such as they would have to face he had decided to take them to the grave with him.

Dr. Maxwell came to Springfield a short time ago from Cedarville, O. While living at the latter place he had been indicted by another physician on a charge of criminal libel. The case is still pending. Since coming there he has been unable to provide for his family properly, and his combined troubles are alleged to have affected his mind.

Zuni Sacred Bread Stones.

For no art or industry within the range of the domestic duties of Zuni, is so much care and instruction bestowed by the old women on the young, as for every process in the making of the he-we, or wafer-breads. Year in and year out, too, while these lessons are being plied, it is told how the famed and beloved "Goddess of the White Shells" taught not a few of her graces—and some secrets—in connection with the daily occupation, which forms their theme. Of these secrets, a chosen few old women of the tribe are the keepers. With many a mysterious rite and severe penance, they quarry and manufacture the enormous baking-stones on which the flaky, toothsome he-we is made. Garrulous enough, mercy knows! are these crones on most other subjects: but they guard with a sphinx-like jealousy such of their methods and observances as add prestige to experience in their occasional calling. The usual number of old women making up a party of "stone-finishers" is four or eight, rarely more. Four days previously to the tempering of the stones they retire to an estufa or lone room, there to fast and engage in certain ceremonials, in which chronic traditional chants and repeating rituals play an important part. During these four days they never come forth unless at rare intervals and for a very short time (and then under the protecting influence of warning head plumes) that they may not be touched by the unitiated. Yet, during the intermissions of their religious observances, they prepare great cakes of pinon gum, carefully wrapping them in strips of cedar bark, and in other ways make ready for the work at hand. On the morning of the day succeeding the last night of their vigil, they repair in single file, headed by a particular clan-priest—usually a "Badger," who on no account touches one of them—to a quarry. Before lifting the stones, before even quarrying any of them, they recite long, propitiatory prayers, casting abundant medicine-meal to the "Flesh of the rock." With other but shorter prayers the fire is kindled by the old priest, who uses as his match a stick of hard wood with which he drills vigorously into a piece of dry, soft root, until the friction ignites the dust of its own making, and to the flames thus generated, offerings of dry food are made. The stones are then brought, and when warm enough, placed over the fires; being constantly anointed with pitch and cactus juice, which they greedily absorb, so that they at least seem solid masses of carbonized substance rather than gritty rock. From the beginning to the end of this tempering process never a word is spoken aloud nor the least excitement or sprightly action indulged in. Sounds uttered would penetrate the grain of the rock and expelled by heat or conflicting with the new "being" (function) of the stone, split scale, or shiver it with a loud noise. So also, the evil influence of undue passion or hasty action would alike be communicated to it—with blighting future effect.

Probably a Bass Invention.

An Oil City boy who went fishing to Oleopolis the other day reports a singular experience. He had hooked a black bass weighing thirty-six pounds, but when he tried to haul his prize to shore the bass jumped at him, chased him up the hill, caught him and tied him securely to a tree with the fish line, ran the fishhook through the fisherman's tongue and calmly walked back to the river. When found the boy was insensible.

Bones as a Fertilizer.

Henry Stewart sets forth the value of bones as a fertilizer in a very plain manner. They consist, when fresh, of 63½ per cent of mineral matter (of which 55 per cent., of the bone, is phosphate of lime); 31½ per cent. of organic matter, chiefly gelatine and fat, and five per cent. of water. The organic matter contains 3½ per cent. of nitrogen; the mineral matter contains from 25 to 25½ per cent. of phosphoric acid, and 30 to 35 per cent. of lime. The phosphoric acid and the nitrogen are the valuable elements, the former being worth, at six cents a pound, $1.50, and the latter, at 25 cents a pound, 87 cents; 100 pounds of bone, then, in a condition to be available would be worth $2.37. But bones when whole are only slowly soluble in the soil. In moist soil they will decay and wholly disappear, only in so many years that it is necessary to reduce them to a fine state of division to make them useful. This is done by reducing them to powder or by burning them to ashes. The latter method is the cheaper, but the nitrogen is lost, and if the bones can be reduced to powder for less cost than the value of the nitrogen, the most costly method is the better. But in many cases it is impossible to grind them for want of mills, and then the burning becomes the only practicable method. This leaves the phosphate of lime in the finest possible condition to be as available for plant food as in the raw bone or more so, because it is not held in an undecomposable condition by the gelatine.

The Past and the Future.

It is well, during the latter part of this month, to review the past in all its different phases. Where mistakes have been made, they can and should be corrected, and to enable the farmer to do this more knowingly, the greatest help he can have is a well-kept diary of farm doings and a systematic account book. These are great helps, and no farmer should neglect to keep them, and properly. It is very often the case that a careful review of the past may save as well as make many a dollar for the farmer in the coming year, and those who go altogether by guess can never count on anything, and are very likely to repeat the same mistakes year after year, We well know that the prices of the past year have not been as high, on most things the farmer produces, as they might have desired, though they should remember that the same has been true in nearly or quite all other branches of industry; the price of clothing and other things which the farmer uses being now as cheap as ever it was, if not below any other prices we ever remember. This equalizes matters, or nearly so. We hope the year to come may bring peace and plenty to the army of workers in agricultural pursuits, and that prices may be such as will please all who strive to produce first-class products.

Take a Look at the Root Cellar.

Yes, it should be seen to frequently, for a few decayed or decaying ones may soon start the whole pile to rotting and much loss be entailed. Where the root crop is stored in the cellar underneath the dwelling house, the rotting of potatoes, etc., may not only entail loss by becoming unsalable, but they may make several large doctor bills, as scarcely anything will do more towards causing illness than being compelled to breathe the noxious gases arising from decaying vegetables. And this is much worse in winter than in summer, as during cold weather the house is kept closed up so much, the fumes are kept confined in the dwelling, and the family compelled to breathe them day and night.

The proper place for a root cellar is underneath an out-kitchen or other building, or under the part of the barn not used for the horses or other stock, though in such places they are apt, often, to be much neglected, causing considerable loss. If a side-barn is built, conveniences should be made for the storage of roots, where they can be kept free from dampness, be kept dark and cool, and still not be where Jack Frost can get at them. Conveniences should be made for unloading and storing as well as loading easily and quickly.

About Butter.

The mode of preparing the butter, when worked and salted, depends on the market it is intended for. Near large cities good butter, made up in small, fancy pats, commands a very high price, if sold directly to the consumer. These pats will not stand any rough usage; they are taken to the market in boxes fitted with trays for alternate layers of butter and ice. For the ordinary market, one or two pound rolls, and square or rectangular ones will pack closest. Each pat should be covered with a clean, white cloth, wrung out of pickle.

Butter intended for keeping should be packed closely in well-glazed earthenware jars; free from cracks, within an inch of the rim; a cloth is then put on, and the jar is filled with salt; the jar is then secured so as to exclude the air as much as possible.

Notes.

Major Pallett's plan of improving wheat is simply to find the best plant of a variety, in a given crop, then its best ear, and, finally, the best grain in the best ear; and with this ultimate best single grain to re-start every year.

It is a question worthy of careful tests whether Lima beans will yield best if trained to tall poles or short ones. In the latter case, the vines are to be pinched or cut off as soon as they reach the top of the poles.

This question presents itself in different forms. Many think that raspberries and blackberries yield better if confined to the height of three or four feet. We must then cut off the laterals as soon as they are a foot or so in length. No stakes are necessary.

Ancient writers suggested picking out the largest grains, and also those from the middle of the ear. Major Hallett also states in the Ag. Gazette that six-and-twenty years ago, in 1858, he planted 18 ears in such a manner that the planting of each grain of each ear corresponded exactly with its position when in the ear, and the larger grains were noted on the diagram of each planting. He found no relation whatever to exist between the best plant produced and the size, or position in the ear, of its parent grain.

GRAINS OF GOLD.

To rise from the table able to eat a little more is a proverbially good rule for every one. There is nothing more idiotic than forcing down a few mouthsful because they happen to remain on one's plate after hunger is satisfied, and because they may be "wasted" if left. It is the most serious waste to overtax the stomach with even half an ounce more than it can take care of.

The great ocean is in a constant state of evaporation. It gives back what it receives, and sends up its waters in mists to gather into clouds; and so there are rain on the fields and storm on the mountains, and greenness and beauty everywhere. But there are many men who do not believe in evaporation. They get all they can and keep all they get, and so are not fertilisers, but only stagnant miasmatic ponds.

LIFE.—You will find existence full of sweet savour if you do not expect from it what it cannot give. When people complain of life, it is almost always because they have asked impossible things from it. Upon this believe wholly the teaching of the wisest. There is but one foundation for a happy life—the pursuit of the good and of the true. You will be well pleased with existence if you make fair use of it, and if you abide well pleased with yourselves. A noble sentence is that which says, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

FALSE IDEALS.—False ideals of happiness haunt the ways of men and lead them on to danger and destruction through the siren song of fantasy. One makes his of wealth. He has enough now for all the purposes of refined living; but he wants that extra, that margin, by which enough may be broadened out into excess and refinement may be made to include frantic luxury and insolent ostentation. "When I shall have so much, I will be content," he says to himself. But he is never content. If he gets a hundred thousand pounds, he wants two; if two, three; and so on, till he covers a million, which then, when compassed, shall positively be the term and boundary of his desires. But the million spreads out and rolls on, as the hundred thousand had done before it.

TRUTH.—Truth comes to us only by glimpses. There some who refuse to receive a partial truth, who insist upon having a clear idea of the whole, or at least upon persuading themselves that they have it, before they yield assent to anything. They will believe nothing which they cannot understand, they say, forgetting that, although we may both believe and understand many things to be true, it is only by occasional glimpses that we can ever discover how they came to be so. For instance, we all believe the wonders of the natural world, the existence and motions of the planets and stars, the changes in the earth's surface, the marvelous growth in the vegetable world, and the still more wonderful development of the animal creation—of conscious life and human intelligence. In believing these things we understand that they are so; but how they came to be so, how they perform their several functions, what are the laws which uphold them and the forces they obey—these things we do not understand, except as study or thought, or participation in another's thought, give us a glimpse of the truth.

A Correction.

"Yes, brethern," says the clergyman who is preaching the funeral sermon, "our deceased brother was cut down in a single night— torn from the arms of his loving wife, who is thus left a disconsolate widow at the age of 24 years." "Twenty-two, if you please," sobs the widow, in the front pew, emerging from her handkerchief for an instant.

As age peetles his brow mit goot knowledges of der vorldt, Tommy goes out to prattle it. From early shildhoot oop, he vas shuck full mit merriments, und he vas wride all dis things down. He vas gone on der newspaper pishness, und many of dhem wood hafe found a grafe yart out, ofer it don't vas been for him.

A SKEPTICAL CLERGYMAN.

Throws Aside His Doubts and Bears Strong Testimony to the Truth, London Advertiser.

Skepticism is a deplorable thing, especially when it leaves the mind on a stormy sea without an anchor or hope of haven. It does not probably prevail any more in these days than it did in the past, but we hear more of it because of the publicity given by the secular press. Some minds are so constituted that they cannot accept anything without proof, and yet they do not necessarily demand that the proof shall have the stamp of highest authority. They recognize merit for itself, and accept it gladly, knowing that eventually it must gain general recognition. The legal and medical professions as well as the ecclesiastical are slow to adopt what may conflict with their notions of self-interest and right. New ideas are almost always disturbing, but eventually they become assimilated and are warmly commended.

The case of the Rev. George Waterman, a talented clergyman of Berwyn Lodge, Bredstone, Winborne, Eng., suggests these observations. He got into a desperate condition, which thoroughly unfitted him for ministerial work. His mind sympathizing with his body, became very much depressed. As the mind is so the thoughts are. He finally put himself under the care of the best London specialists. For several years he pursued the ever fleeting phantom, but at length they told him his case was beyond amendment. Still more thoroughly depressed, he grew skeptical to a degree and believed himself doomed.

Providentially, however, he had his attention drawn to a widely-reputed means of restoration in cases like his own. He reluctantly began its use. Every few weeks he had chemical analyses made, and finding constant improvement, he eagerly persevered, and when twenty-six bottles had been used, the analyst reported: "No trace of either albumen or sugar by the severest tests." In other words, he exclaimed with raptnre, "I was cured." He had Bright's disease of the kidneys. That was in 1882, and from day to day he put aside his skepticism at the use of an unauthorized remedy until to-day he has been strong and well in body and mind, and contrary to the boasts of his medical friends, has had no relapse. It is only fair to remark, though it may be unusual for papers editorially to do so, that Warner's Safe Cure is the remedy which saved Mr. Waterman's life, to which he ever bears willing testimony. And when we see it publicly endorsed by such eminent persons of quality as the Right Rev. Bishop Edward Wilson, the Rev. W. S. Henderson, of Prescott, Madame Sainton-Dolby, the renowned music teacher of London, Dr. Dio Lewis; the famous American hygienist, the Rev. Dr. Squirrel, of Rugby, Eng., the Rev. D. A. Brown, of Aultsville, Mr. Arthur Augur, of Montreal, Capt. W. H. Nichols, of Hamilton, the Rev. Dr. R. C. Sowerby, of Helensburg, N. B., the Rev. James Brierly, M. A., Congleton, Eng., the Hon. Geo. Taylor, of the Globe, and others equally well-known, we unhesitatingly commend it to the favor of our readers.

Catarrh—A New Treatment.

Perhaps the most extraordinary success that has been achieved in modern science has been attained by the Dixon Treatment of catarrh. Out of 2,000 patients treated during the past six months, fully ninety per cent. have been cured of this stubborn malady. This is none the less startling when it is remembered that not five per cent. of the patients presenting themselves to the regular practitioner are benefitted, while the patent medicines and other advertised cures never record a cure at all. Starting with the claim now generally believed by the most scientific men that the disease is due to the presence of living parasites in the tissues, Mr. Dixon at once adapted his cure to their extermination; this accomplished the catarrh is practically cured, and the permanency is unquestioned, as cures effected by him four years ago are cures still. No one else has ever attempted to cure catarrh in this manner, and no other treatment has ever cured catarrh. The application of the remedy is simple and can be done at home, and the present season of the year is the most favorable for a speedy and permanent cure, the majority of cases being cured at one treatment. Sufferers should correspond with Messrs. A. H. DIXON & SON, 305 King-street West, Toronto, Canada, and enclose stamp for their treatise on catarrh.—Montreal Star

Storing Ice.

Every family should have ice for the summer. Hence build an ice house. Select some spot shaded if possible and protected from the wind. Every ice house should have a kind of cellar dug, which must be filled up with stones covered with a layer of sand. This will permit the water to escape. On the foundation place a common sill; on this put the plank upright and nail outside boards well batted; inside any rough boards will do. The aim is to make the wall hollow and thus prevent conduction of heat from the heated atmosphere; the space must be filled with saw-dust, tanbark or rough course chaff. Roof of common boards is all that is needed, well batted. Opening should be left on each gable end to permit a free draft. Door should be double and filled with saw dust. When ice is put in let water be poured over each layer to fill up the crevices and prevent entrance of air. At first a layer of saw-duss should be put on floor at least six inches or a foot deep. A foot space be left between ice and walls, and this space should be filled with saw-dust. Over the top layer a good thickness of saw-dust or whatever other material is used.
